- Second lieutenant, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
Sent forward through terrific machine-gun and artillery fire to take command of a platoon in the front lines, he displayed marked personal courage and heroism, inspiring the men serving under him by his example of fearlessness. During a heavy counterattack he showed great gallantry, coolly placing his guns where they could best fire upon the advancing enemy, although subjected the while to intense enemy fire. He succeeded in breaking up the enemy attack, and although wounded by a machine-gun bullet refused to be evacuated until the enemy had withdrawn.
- Private, medical detachment, 310th Infantry, 78th Division.
During the night of Sept. 17, Private Huff gave proof of great devotion to duty by leaving protection and assisting another comrade in bringing a wounded soldier to safety. Again, on the morning of Sept. 27, he left shelter and journeyed over 600 yards to the side of a wounded comrade, through shellfire, carrying the victim to the first-aid station.
- Sergeant, Company C, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
Sergeant Huffman organized an automatic-rifle squad under heavy machine-gun fire and led it in an attack upon an enemy machine-gun nest. The guns and crew were captured. The enemy gun was firing with serious effect on the right flank of his company, causing heavy losses. Later he took charge of a bombing squad and raided an enemy machine-gun position, capturing the guns and crew. In this latter operation he was severely wounded.
- Private, 97th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
During the action at Boursches, France, on June 6, 1918, he volunteered to leave shelter to bring in wounded, and upon receiving permission to do so he carried injured comrades through artillery and machine-gun fire at great risk to his own life.
- Private, 79th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
After being severely wounded in the occupation of Boursches, France, on June 6, 1918, he refused to go to the rear, but remained and assisted with the wounded, displaying great self-sacrifice and devotion to duty.
- Mechanic, Company C, 146th Infantry, 37th Division.
This soldier was constantly on duty as a runner during the offensive west of the Meuse River, many times carrying messages through heavy machine-gun and shellfire. On Sept. 30, when the enemy was reported to be forming for a counterattack on the left flank, he volunteered to take the information to the battalion commander. Passing through heavy shellfire, he delivered the message in time to enable the battalion commander to protect the threatened flank, but he was killed by a shell on his return trip to his company. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Kathryn Hughes.
- Corporal, 20th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He conducted a patrol to the front, located machine-gun nests, and gained contact with the enemy under very severe artillery and machine-gun fire, and set an example of calmness and courage under these hazardous conditions.
- Sergeant, Company B, 348th Machine Gun Battalion, 91st Division.
He was seriously gassed Sept. 27, but refused to leave his post and continued working and fighting with his comrades under heavy shelling for 3 days till complete exhaustion forced him to be evacuated.
- Private, first class, Company L, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
Though he had been wounded in the leg and ordered to be evacuated, Private Hughes remained with his company in the advance, displaying marked fortitude. Twenty-four hours later his leg had become so stiff that he was compelled to go to the rear. This soldier had previously displayed marked courage by remaining with his automatic rifle under heavy fire, after 2 members of his squad had become casualties, until he had silenced an enemy machine gun.
- Private, Company M, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
Because his company had already suffered heavy casualties and he realized that all men possible were needed on the firing line, he refused to be evacuated when seriously wounded, and continued in the advance till the objective had been reached and consolidated 8 hours later.
- Marine Gunner, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
At Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he displayed extraordinary heroism during attack on the enemy's lines, during which time he constantly exposed himself to the enemy's fire without regard for personal danger, thereby assuring the delivery of supplies. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Victoria C. Hulbert.
- Private, Company F, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
Crawling to the aid of 2 men who had been left when his company withdrew, he was exposed to both sniper and machine-gun fire. On reaching the side of his comrades he found them both to be dead, after which he made his way safely back to our lines.

- Private, Company H, 112th Infantry, 28th Division.
When the 2 companies of the 112th Infantry holding the town of Fismette were forced to withdraw after suffering heavy casualties as a result of desperate enemy assault, Private Hunt with 7 other men volunteered to remain and keep down an enflaming fire, which was seriously interfering with the withdrawal across the Vesle River of the few remaining men of the command. When again attacked by an overwhelming force, he was one of the defenders of the crossing and made possible the retirement of about 20 of his comrades. He continued to hold the position against great odds, inflicting heavy casualties upon the enemy, and finally retired under orders, fighting his way through machine-gun, rifle, and trench-mortar fire. His exceptional disregard for personal safety, resourcefulness, and bravery were an inspiration to all his comrades.
- Private, Company L, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
While the advance of his company was being held up by terrific machine-gun fire from several enemy nests and after all the members of his squad had become casualties, he made his way forward with his automatic rifle. Under a continual rain of machine-gun and shell fire, he operated his gun against the enemy until the gun jammed; whereupon he took a shovel, rushed a machine-gun post 75 yards away, and killed the gunner, thereby enabling the continuance of the advance.
- Captain, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
After 6 hours of severe fighting, Captain Hunt and his men succeeded in reducing a large sector of trenches and machine-gun nests and captured 300 prisoners. On Oct. 4, near St. Etienne, he constantly exposed himself to enemy fire while leading his men toward their objective. His gallant conduct gave his men confidence to completely rout superior forces concentrating for a counterattack.
- First sergeant, 67th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
During the attack at Chateau-Thierry, France, on June 6, 1918, he fearlessly exposed himself and encouraged all men near him, although he himself was wounded 3 times. He subsequently died of wounds.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Ida M. Hunter.
- Second lieutenant, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
Under terrific machine-gun and sniper fire, Lieutenant Hunter led his battalion scouts into Trugny Woods 200 yards ahead of the assaulting waves and, crawling to within 30 feet of an enemy machine-gun nest, killed or wounded every member of the crew. He then crawled from point to point along the front under intense fire and noted the position of the enemy guns, returning with information which enabled his battalion to clear the woods.
- Lieutenant colonel, 76th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
While directing the operations of his battalion in a forward position under heavy artillery fire a high-explosive shell exploded under his horse, killing the horse and severely wounding Lieutenant Colonel Hunter in the right leg. In spite of his serious injuries he insisted upon seeing his battery commanders and before being evacuated he personally charged each with his mission, urging them to put forth all possible efforts in carrying out their important mission.
- First lieutenant, pilot, 103d Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Lieutenant Hunter, while on patrol, alone attacked 2 enemy biplanes, destroying 1 and forcing the other to retire. In the course of the combat he was wounded in the forehead. Despite his injuries he succeeded in returning his damaged plane to his own aerodrome.
Oak-leaf clusters (4).
A bronze oak leaf, for extraordinary heroism in action in the region of Champey, France, Sept. 13, 1918. He, accompanied by 1 other plane, attacked an enemy patrol of 6 planes. Despite numerical superiority and in a decisive combat, he destroyed 1 enemy plane and, with the aid of his companion, forced the others within their own lines.
A bronze oak leaf, for extraordinary heroism in action near Verneville, France, Sept. 17, 1918. Leading a patrol of 3 planes, he attacked an enemy formation of 8 planes. Although outnumbered, they succeeded in bringing down 4 of the enemy. Lieutenant Hunter accounted for 2 of these.
A bronze oak leaf, for extraordinary heroism in action in the region of Liny-devant-Dun, France, Oct. 4, 1918. While separated from his patrol he observed an allied patrol of 7 planes (Bregnets) hard pressed by an enemy formation of 10 planes (Fokker type). He attacked 2 of the enemy that were harassing a single Breguet, and in a decisive fight destroyed 1 of them. Meanwhile 5 enemy planes approached and concentrated their fire upon him. Undaunted by their superiority, he attacked and brought down a second plane.
A bronze oak leaf, for extraordinary heroism in action in the region of Bantheville, France, Oct. 6, 1918. While on patrol he encountered an enemy formation of 6 monoplanes. He immediately attacked and destroyed 1 enemy plane and forced the others to disperse in confusion.
- Private, first class, Company G, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
He showed himself to be conspicuously brave when at Vaux, France, July 3, 1918, although wounded by a shell and unable to carry ammunition, for which duty he had been detailed, he went over the top with his squad and fought heroically with it until killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to half-sister, Mrs. Mack Auten.

- Captain, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
His company having reached its objective, he ordered several patrols forward to silence several enemy machine guns which were causing heavy casualties in his own and other companies of his battalion. The patrols meeting heavy casualties from the intense enemy fire, Captain Hurley himself organized a patrol and led it forward. While temporarily checked by the intense fire, he crawled forward and rescued a wounded officer, carrying him to a place of shelter. Resuming the advance of the patrol Captain Hurley was severely wounded, but continued to direct the movement of his men, who, inspired by the great courage and fortitude of their leader, pushed forward and captured the machine-gun nest, killing or capturing the crews thereof.

From the beginning of the attack he stood on a railroad embankment within 70 meters of the enemy line, fully exposed to their observation, and under a continuous and intense fire of concealed machine guns, rifles, and artillery. From this position he continued to direct, control, and encourage his officers and men during the progress of the attack, and even after he had been wounded and until exhausted by loss of blood. He refused to be evacuated until he had given full instructions to his second in command and until all wounded enlisted men had been evacuated. His exceptional example of physical and mental courage was an inspiration to all his officers and men under the most trying and dangerous conditions. |

- Corporal, Headquarters Company, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.
He was a member of a section operating 37-millimeter guns which was attacked by the enemy. After removing the guns to safety he learned that the officer commanding the section had been captured, whereupon he organized a party of 5, attacked the enemy's patrol, numbering 35, and succeeded in delivering the captured officer, killing 15 of the enemy and personally capturing 2. Later in the same evening, in entire disregard for his own safety, he assisted a sergeant in organizing 75 men for a counterattack, which they launched in the face of heavy fire at close range, driving the enemy back for more than a kilometer.
- Sergeant, Company G, 317th Infantry, 80th Division.
Patrolling by himself in front of the line, he came upon a machine-gun emplacement manned by a German officer and 3 men. He wounded the officer and 1 soldier by rifle fire, captured the other 2 men, and took them, with the machine gun, to the rear.
- Colonel, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
He personally led a reconnaissance patrol through the eastern and northern edges of Bois-de-la-Pultiere in order to obtain most necessary information while the area was being continuously bombarded by high-explosive and gas shells and raked by machine-gun fire. His courage and bravery was a splendid example and an inspiration to the officers and men of his command.
- Sergeant, Company F, 370th Infantry, 93d Division.
He was in command of a detachment and was ordered to attack the German line. After rescuing, under fire, a wounded comrade he charged with his detachment, took a fortified tunnel, and, though far in advance of our lines and without rations and ammunition, held the position for more than 36 hours, until relieved, making use of captured guns and ammunition to repel the counterattacks made upon him.
- Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.
While installing a telephone line his regiment started an attack. The enemy responded with a terrific barrage and before the communication was completed Sergeant Jenkins was in the midst of a heavy encounter. Bravely he remained at his post, endeavoring to establish telephone service, but was instantly killed by shellfire.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. Eunice G. Strother.
- Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
He volunteered to go forward with 3 other soldiers to reduce 2 machine-gun nests which successively held up our advance. Crawling forward under heavy fire, he showed marked personal bravery, attacking and killing occupants of the enemy emplacements.
- Captain, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.
He commanded the second battalion of his regiment with conspicuous gallantry. With utter disregard for his own safety, he continued throughout the action to direct his troops personally, moving about from place to place under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire. Exposing himself to the hostile fire, he encouraged his men in their efforts to break through the enemy's line and succeeded in maintaining their aggressive spirit by his personal example of fearlessness.
- First lieutenant, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
He fearlessly led his company in an attack under a heavy bombardment, encouraging his men by his example. He was killed by shellfire while in the performance of this act.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. D. N. Jenks.
- Bugler, Battery E, 119th Field Artillery, 32d Division.
As he was returning from a reconnaissance with his battery commander, under heavy enemy artillery fire, a shell struck between them, mortally wounding the officer and throwing Bugler Jennart from his horse, which was killed. Although he was himself seriously wounded, this soldier crawled across the road to the assistance of his captain, and just before he reached the latter's side was instantly killed by another bursting shell.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Leon Jennart, sr.
- Sergeant, Company M, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
He displayed marked bravery during an attack by his company, and when liaison with adjoining units had been lost volunteered repeatedly for dangerous missions, he being a sergeant at the time. He exposed himself in the open to enemy machine-gun fire to rescue wounded soldiers and reorganized the company after heavy casualties had been sustained.
- Pharmacist's mate, second class, U. S. Navy, attached to 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He worked fearlessly and efficiently at caring for the wounded in an advanced dressing station exposed to heavy shell and rifle fire. He was wounded when a shell struck and partly wrecked his aid station, but he refused to be evacuated, and continued at his post for 48 hours.

- Private, Machine Gun Company, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
In the action in the Bois-du-Fays on Oct. 9 he was wounded, but returned to the line as soon as he had his wound dressed. He was soon wounded the second time and sent to the first-aid station, where he was ordered to the rear, but instead he returned to the line, where he was wounded for the third time, and carried to the rear on a stretcher.
- Private, Company E, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.
When his company had suffered heavy casualties and had been withdrawn, Private Jensen went out with another soldier in advance of our lines under machine-gun fire to rescue the wounded. In attempting this hazardous mission he was seriously wounded.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Karsten Jensen.
- Corporal, Company A, 121st Machine Gun Battalion, 32d Division.
Passing through heavy fire and through wire entanglements, he led his section to a posit on 500 meters in advance of the Infantry, where he set up his guns and effectively covered the advance. He showed marked bravery and skill in leading his men, capturing 22 prisoners without sustaining a casualty.
- Private, Company K, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
He was so seriously wounded that he could not operate his automatic rifle, but refused to be evacuated, and continued with the rifle team, taking the place of first leader. Becoming very weak from the loss of blood, he was ordered to the rear by his platoon commander, but on his way back picked up a rifle and continued in the fight until the enemy had been driven back.
- Private, Company B, Replacement Battalion, American Expeditionary Forces, Siberia.
He drove an automobile repeatedly through a zone swept by the fire of rifles, machine guns, and fieldpieces of contending Russian Government and insurgent troops, rescuing many noncombatants who were entrapped in the Vladivostok station between the lines, carrying them to places of safety, thus undoubtedly saving many lives.
- Corporal, Company F, 322d Infantry, 81st Division.
While acting as scout 400 yards in advance of his company he opened fire on 10 Germans advancing in front of his position, killing 2, wounding 1, and causing the rest to retreat.
- Captain, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
Although wounded 5 times, when his company was suddenly fired upon by machine guns, while crossing an open field, Captain Jervy remained in command of his company until he became unconscious.
- First Lieutenant, Ordnance Department, attached to 1st Army, Observation Group, Air Service.
Assigned to the 1st Army Observation Group, Air Service, as armament officer, he volunteered as observer on a photographic mission from Ontedy to Longuyon, 25 kilometers into the enemy lines. In combat with 14 enemy aircraft which followed, one enemy aircraft was destroyed. Lieutenant Jervy, regardless of the fact that his plane was badly shot up and that his hands were badly frozen, continued on the mission, returning only upon its successful conclusion.
- Colonel, 316th Engineers, 91st Division.
Assigned to the command of an Infantry brigade, he was directed to go forward, find his brigade, and consolidate his regiments, which had become separated. He crossed territory under terrific fire and pulled his rear regiment to the aid of the regiment in the front, which was seriously engaged, thereafter commanding the movements of both regiments in a highly creditable manner.
- Private, Company F, 309th Infantry, 78th Division.
Although suffering from illness, he volunteered as runner, and repeatedly carried messages across heavily shelled areas, displaying the greatest courage and coolness.
- First Lieutenant, 115th Infantry, 29th Division.
While in command of his platoon during an engagement of the 29th Division, Verdun sector, he displayed exceptional bravery, disregarding his own safety, and encouraged his men both by words and action. While leading his platoon, in an attack on a machine-gun nest he was instantly killed, but the attack, begun by him, continued and resulted in the machine-gun nest being captured.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, W. L. J. Jobes.
- Sergeant, Company K, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
With complete disregard of his own danger, he went forward alone, when the advance was held up by 2 machine-gun nests, and single handed reduced these positions, capturing 9 prisoners. Later single handed, he attacked the crews of 3 machine guns, being severely wounded in this action.

- Corporal, Company D, 306th Machine Gun Battalion, 77th Division.
Two platoons of his company being surrounded by strong enemy forces, Corporal Johnson continued to operate his machine gun with little rest for 5 days. Each day small enemy groups endeavored to capture the machine gun, which was stationed on the right flank of the company; on each occasion Corporal Johnson remained with his gun in the face of deadly enemy fire, delivering bursts of fire which drove the enemy raiders to cover, killing and wounding many of them. Wounded on Oct. 4 by grenade fire, he still remained at his post; he was again wounded on Oct. 5. On Oct. 7, owing to his wounds, his machine gun was temporarily out of action and the ground held by riflemen. On the afternoon of this day the enemy launched an attack against the right flank, using liquid fire, whereupon Corporal Johnson, in spite of his exhaustion due to his wounds, resumed operation of his machine gun, and with such effect as to repulse the enemy.

- Cook, Company B, 361st Infantry, 91st Division.
Under heavy shellfire and badly wounded, he constantly assisted for 3 days in cooking for an entire battalion in the front line.
- Private, first class, Company B, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.
Although he had been painfully wounded in the back by a bursting shell, Private Johnson continued to perform his duties as a runner under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, thereby enabling his company commander to maintain control of the company. He remained on duty until late in the night when he was ordered to the dressing station.
- Sergeant, Company E, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
Coming unexpectedly upon a German machine gun, he threw himself upon it as it started firing, being himself killed but preventing any casualties among the members of his own platoon, the enemy gunners being made prisoners.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Carl Johnson.
- First lieutenant, 313th Infantry, 79th Division.
He constantly exposed himself to the enemy fire during the action at Montfaucon, setting an example to his men by his fearlessness. When severely wounded by shellfire he assisted 2 wounded men of his company to the rear and refused to occupy space in the ambulance until these men had been provided for.
- Major, 27th Infantry.
On three successive occasions he went through a zone swept by intense fire of contending factions to the railroad station and brought out noncombatants through the continuous fire from rifles and machine guns.
- Major, 372d Infantry, 93d Division.
He led his battalion with exceptional bravery and judgment through a heavy enemy barrage in an attack on a strong hostile force on the plateau south of Bussy Farm, fearlessly exposing himself to point out enemy machine-gun positions. Having attained his objective, he held his ground in spite of the fact that his command had been badly cut up and participated in the attack on the following day. In spite of the strong resistance, his battalion captured a large number of guns, an ammunition dump, and valuable material.
His fearlessness, energy, and leadership inspired his men to successful attack.
- Sergeant, medical detachment, 56th Infantry, 7th Division.
When the company to which he was attached withdrew from their position and the medical personnel was ordered to find a place of safety, Sergeant Johnson refused to leave the wounded. He carried a seriously wounded officer 1 1/2 kilometers through a heavy artillery barrage to the battalion aid station.
- Sergeant, Company G, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
He personally reconnoitered a heavily guarded enemy position and killed one of the foe. In spite of being seriously wounded, he succeeded in returning to his patrol, informing them of the enemy's position and thereby enabling them to capture the entire enemy force.
- Sergeant, Company B, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
His company having been held up by concentrated machine-gun and artillery fire, Sergeant Johnson and another soldier went forward and made a reconnaissance, locating a way forward which was protected from direct fire.
Although he was badly wounded, Sergeant Johnson returned and led his company along this route, thereby enabling the entire battalion to advance.
- Private, Battery C, 119th Field Artillery, 32d Division.
When an enemy shell burst at the rear end of the gun pit, wounding him and all the members of the gun crew except the chief of the section, Private Johnson concealed the fact that he had received two severe wounds in the back after he had assisted in removing his wounded comrades. He then resumed his duties and continued serving the piece for about 10 minutes until he collapsed.
- Sergeant, Company A, 318th Infantry, 80th Division.
While leading a patrol, Sergeant Johnson encountered terrific machine-gun fire, which forced him to order his patrol to cover. He then advanced alone, working his way to the nest, which he destroyed, thereby permitting the patrol to continue its operation. Later the same day he braved the perils of an extremely heavy barrage to bring to safety a wounded comrade who was lying 300 yards in advance of the lines.
- Captain, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
Captain Johnston led his company through heavy machine-gun and artillery fire in the attack to his objective. Upon reaching a position scheduled for a passage of the lines he located a strong enemy position. Upon his own initiative he led his company in a bayonet attack and captured about 200 prisoners.

- Corporal, Company B, 102d Infantry, 26th Division. During a barrage lasting 2 hours he placed his men in the best shelter available, remaining in observation himself, and refused to take cover. He organized a platoon of men who had become separated from their commands and led them forward under a heavy fire from artillery, machine guns, and snipers. Throughout the engagement he was a source of inspiration to his men.
- Battalion sergeant major, Headquarters Company, Motor Battalion, 1st Ammunition Train, 1st Division. Near Beaumont, Sergeant Major Jones displayed marked courage by refusing to be evacuated after being wounded, remaining on duty under severe shell fire and preventing a traffic blockade. At Missy-aux-Bois an enemy shell set fire to a pile of ammunition which he was salvaging. Disregarding danger, he managed to save a larger pile near by, extinguishing the flames. Though he was slightly wounded, he continued his work until every box of ammunition was salvaged.
- Private, Company D, 364th Infantry, 91st Division. During the attack Private Jones rushed, under enemy machine-gun fire, into the open in advance of the lines held and rendered first aid to a badly wounded officer who was lying exposed to enemy machine-gun fire.
- Private, Company G, 313th Infantry, 79th Division. While on his way to the dressing station for treatment, hearing a call for a volunteer to carry an important message from brigade headquarters to a regiment which was being pressed back, Private Jones volunteered and carried the message through a terrific intervening enemy barrage, and as a result of his courageous actions reinforcements arrived at a critical time.
- Second lieutenant, 147th Aero Squadron, Air Service. Lieutenant Jones and 4 other pilots were attacked by 9 German pursuit planes. Without hesitation he dove into the leader of the enemy formation, pouring machine-gun fire into him at 100 yards. After a quick and decisive combat the enemy leader fell out of control. He then attacked 2 of the other enemy planes, which were attacking him from the rear, and succeeded in driving them off.
- Corporal, Company A, 30th Engineers, attached to British Expeditionary Forces. While returning from the front lines on the morning of Apr. 9, 1918, his platoon was subjected to a heavy shell fire, several of the men being killed or wounded, the balance taking shelter near by. Corporal Jones persisted in leaving his shelter and searching for wounded, several of whom he brought back in the midst of a barrage. He carried on the work in heroic manner for the benefit of his comrades and with disregard for his own personal safety.
- Private, Company E, 118th Infantry, 30th Division. Crawling to the flanks of a German machine-gun nest, he covered the crew with his rifle from a distance of 30 yards and captured 12 of the enemy. This gallant soldier was subsequently killed in action. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Sam Jones.
- Corporal, Company F, 318th Infantry, 80th Division. Making his way through a heavy barrage, he brought valuable information as to the enemy's position to his company commander. He then returned to the enemy's position, showing absolute disregard for his own personal danger and brought back 2 wounded men who had fallen there.
- Sergeant, Company B, 112th Infantry, 28th Division. Ordered to clear Hill 244 of the enemy, Sergeant Jones led a patrol of 7 men up a steep slope under enemy grenade fire by which 4 of his men were killed. Pushing on with the remaining 3, he silenced 3 machine-gun nests and 12 snipers, driving off the remainder of the Germans. He then sent one of his men back with a message and with the other 2 held the position for 2 hours until he was relieved.
- Corporal, Company M, 358th Infantry, 90th Division. With the assistance of one other soldier, Corporal Jones attacked a machine-gun nest from the flank and captured the gun, together with 11 prisoners.
- Second lieutenant, pilot, 22d Aero Squadron, Air Service. Lieutenant Jones, while attacking 4 enemy planes (Fokker type), was in turn attacked from above and obliged to dive through a formation of 15 planes (Fokker type). His plane was riddled with bullets, but he managed to destroy one of the enemy machines. Oak-leaf cluster. For the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near St. Mihiel, France, Oct. 18, 1918, Lieutenant Jones is awarded an oak-leaf cluster to be worn with the distinguished-service cross: He was a member of a patrol which succeeded in hedging in a fast enemy biplane. Approaching the enemy plane, Lieutenant Jones signaled the enemy to give up and land. The reply was a burst of machine-gun fire, which cut his wind shield and set fire to his plane. He then closed in and shot the German pilot and sent the plane crashing to the ground. He landed in his own plane and extinguished the flames.

- Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.
In command of a detachment of signalmen in the crossing of the Vesle River, Sergeant Jones was severely gassed while transmitting an important message to the rear. He, however, continued with his message the entire distance to the regimental headquarters, where he arrived exhausted and suffering severely from burns and gas inhalation. Although tagged at the dressing station for evacuation, he refused to be evacuated and returned to the front line, later bringing 3 other men blinded by gas to the rear. Sergeant Jones subsequently died from the injuries received.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Daniel L. Jones.

- First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 368th Infantry, 92d Division. Lieutenant Jones went into an open area subjected to direct machine-gun fire to care for a wounded soldier who was being carried by another officer. While dressing the wounded runner, a machine-gun bullet passed between his arms and chest and a man was killed within a few yards of him.
- Wagoner, Supply Company, 166th Infantry, 42d Division. During the great German artillery bombardment of July 15 he was driving a ration cart to the front lines when he was caught in the heavy bombardment. Both his mules were killed and he was blown from his seat by a shell explosion, the same shell killing a comrade on the cart ahead of him. Catching a stray mule and borrowing another, he returned with his comrade to the company, after which he delivered his rations. After his team became frightened and ran away, he remained in the fight throughout the attack of the day. While delivering rations he was wounded, but he completed his task before he would allow his wound to be dressed.
- Corporal, Company I, 166th Infantry, 42d Division. When his platoon came under heavy fire from a machine-gun nest on its flank, he took part of his squad, surrounded the nest, and captured the gun and crew.
- Sergeant, Company G, 131st Infantry, 33d Division. Upon his own initiative he advanced under concentrated rifle and machine-gun fire, which was holding up his platoon, and put out of action a nest of light machine guns on the flank, thereby permitting the platoon to continue forward.
- Private, medical detachment, 118th Infantry, 30th Division. In the face of heavy enemy fire Private Jones, together with 3 other stretcher bearers, advanced before our front line and brought back to shelter a wounded Australian officer.
- Private, Company H, 119th Infantry, 30th Division. He repeatedly exposed himself to enemy fire to save his comrades, going forward in advance of our lines to attack machine-gun nests. After reducing 1 enemy nest with rifle grenades, he proceeded to attack another, and while so doing was killed by enemy snipers. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, George W. Jordan.
- Private, Company L, 16th Infantry, 1st Division. He went forward under intense machine-gun and artillery fire and assisted in the removal of a wounded soldier over a distance of 1 kilometer.
- Corporal, Company M, 111th Infantry, 28th Division. Having learned from a raid of the previous night that a comrade was lying wounded in front of his lines, Corporal Jordan set out to rescue him after seeing two other men killed in the attempt. Crawling in full view of the enemy, he was shot through the leg when a storm of fire was directed at him, but he struggled on and brought his man to safety.
- Corporal, 8th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. After all the other members of their gun crews had become casualties, Corporal Jordan and another soldier advanced with their gun through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire to an advanced position and put up their gun in action in support of the Infantry. They remained in this position after the Infantry had retired and until their ammunition was exhausted.
- Private, Company H, 117th Infantry, 30th Division. When his platoon was subjected to heavy machine-gun fire from the front and flanks, Private Jordan courageously operated his automatic rifle from an exposed position with such good effect that fire superiority was maintained until reinforcements arrived.
- Corporal, Company A, 1st Gas Regiment. After other means of communication had failed, he voluntarily carried messages from the regimental post of command to advanced positions through several enemy barrages of gas and high-explosive shells. He continued on duty, even after being wounded, until he was exhausted.

Under the protection of 3 pursuit planes, each carrying a pilot and an observer, Lieutenants Bernheimer and Jordan, in charge of a photo plane, carried out successfully a hazardous photographic mission over the enemy's lines to the River Aisne. The 4 American ships were attacked by 12 enemy battle planes. Lieutenant Bernheimer, by coolly and skillfully maneuvering his ship, and Lieutenant Jordan, by accurate operation of his machine gun, in spite of wounds in the shoulder and leg, aided materially in the victory which came to the American ship and returned safely with 36 valuable photographs. The pursuit plane operated by Lieutenants Hitchcock and Burns was disabled while these two officers were fighting effectively. Lieutenant Burns was mortally wounded and his body jammed the controls. After a headlong fall of 2,500 meters, Lieutenant Hitchcock succeeded in regaining control of this plane and piloted it back to his airdrome. Lieutenants McClendon and Plummer were shot down and killed after a vigorous combat with 5 of the enemy's planes. - First lieutenant, pilot, 99th Aero Squadron, Air Service. He, with First Lieut. Raymond C. Hill, observer, was directed to take photographs of the old Hindenburg line. They were accompanied by 2 protecting planes. After they had taken some photographs the protecting planes were driven off by hostile aircraft, but he and his observer continued their mission alone, until in the vicinity of Lachaussee they were attacked by an enemy formation of 9 planes. Lieutenant Kahle put up a gallant fight, in which his observer was shot through the heart and killed. Although pitted against overwhelming odds, Lieutenant Kahle, by his pluck, determination, skill, and courage, brought the photographs and the plane back to his airbase, the enemy keeping up a constant attack upon him back to our lines, riddling the plane with machine-gun bullets. - Private, Company D, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
After he and a comrade had located a hostile machine gun in a clump of trees 500 meters north of a chateau, east of Fere-en-Tardenois, they volunteered to attempt to force the enemy to abandon this position, and advanced against it over open ground in the face of fire. By their rifle fire they drove the enemy crew from its gun, killing 1 and wounding another.
- Private, Company A, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
Private Kayser, with an automatic rifle, went forward in advance of our line and opened fire on an enemy machine-gun position in order to cover the flank attack of another platoon. Although mortally wounded, he continued to fire until the platoon had completed its flanking movement.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Alfred Kayser.
- Corporal, Battery B, 5th Field Artillery, 1st Division.
He displayed unusual ability and courage by taking the place of officers who had been wounded and faithfully performing their duties while his battery position was under severe flanking fire. He continually exposed himself to violent bombardment until killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother Mrs. Lydia Keachie.
- First lieutenant, 15th Field Artillery, 2d Division.
He accompanied 2 successive waves of Infantry in the attack on Vierzy and Villemontoire, July 18, exposed himself with almost reckless disregard of the enemy's heavy shell and machine-gun fire, secured valuable information for the artillery as to the location of our own and the enemy's lines, and personally took command of an isolated 9th Infantry machine-gun detachment that had lost its officers by heavy fire. Lieutenant Kean on July 18 and 19 actually accompanied 3 successive waves of the 2d Infantry, the 9th Infantry, and an attack by French infantry without rest. His endurance and courage were exceptional and most inspiring upon this occasion and upon all other occasions of attack by the 2d Division.
- Private, first class, medical detachment, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
Throughout the engagement he displayed great gallantry and devotion to duty by treating the wounded in an area swept by machine-gun and artillery fire.
When 2 stretcher bearers who were working with him were killed he impressed German prisoners into the service of carrying wounded to the aid station.
- Private, Company B, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
When liaison with the front-line companies had been completely broken and several runners had failed to reach them he successfully carried a message through an intense machine-gun and artillery barrage, returning with important information.
- Private, Company E, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
He rushed machine-gun nests that were holding up the advance of his company, killed the crews with his automatic rifle, and captured the guns. He continued to render valiant service throughout the engagement until he was wounded by a shell fragment.
- First lieutenant, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.
When a counterattack was impending he successively carried 15 wounded men across a shell-swept area, in full view of the enemy, taking them to a place of safety and preventing them from being captured by the enemy. Later he reorganized groups of stragglers and led them into combat.
- First lieutenant, Air Service, with headquarters, American Air Service units, attached to 49th Squadron, British Expeditionary Forces.
For extraordinary heroism in action. On Aug. 9, 1918, he bombed Falvy Bridge over 1,000 feet, obtaining a direct hit. On returning, his formation was attacked by enemy planes and a running fight ensued. By skillfully flying with exceptional coolness he enabled his observer to shoot 2 planes down in flames. On Aug. 8, 1918, after bombing Bethencourt Bridge over 800 feet, obtaining a direct hit, he found 7 enemy planes attacking his formation from the rear. By maneuvering for position he enabled his observer to shoot 1 down in flames over Bethencourt. On July 17, 1918, he bombed Passy Bridge over 500 feet, destroying it just as a column of transport was passing.
He then opened machine-gun fire on the troops in the vicinity, causing many casualties and great disorder. His exceptional courage and splendid bravery were a constant inspiration to the members of his command.
- Captain, 114th Infantry, 29th Division.
While he was in command of the machine-gun company of his regiment and every available gunner had been killed or wounded he personally manned one of the guns and kept it in operation until killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Raymond M. Keating.
- Private, Company G, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
Becoming separated from his patrol, Private Keaton, with another soldier, attacked an enemy patrol and drove it off, though the number of their opponents was estimated at 50. During the advance of Sept. 12 north of Feyen-Haye he went to the rescue of his battalion commander and another officer, who were pocketed by the fire of a machine gun. He stalked the gun position and drove off the gunners.

- Private, Company L, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
Private Keith voluntarily joined a patrol whose mission was to locate enemy machine guns and to secure such other information as might be of value to the attacking forces. The patrol penetrated the enemy's lines to a distance of a kilometer, locating a large number of machine-gun nests. Cut off from their own troops without food or water for 36 hours and under constant enemy fire, 1 officer and 18 of the 36 men of the patrol were either killed or wounded. Private Keith with indomitable spirit made his way to the American forces, in broad daylight under intense enemy fire, furnished valuable information of the enemy to his battalion commander, and voluntarily made his way back to the beleaguered patrol in order to lead them to their own lines; they thus escaped the American barrage which preceded the attack of Oct. 4, 1918. His undaunted courage, leadership, and devotion to duty proved an inspiration to every man of his regiment.

B—Pueblo, Colo.
G. O. No. 64, W. D., 1919.
- First lieutenant, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
During a night attack made by his battalion, Lieutenant Kelly, the battalion adjutant, voluntarily left his dugout and went to the front-line positions through the intense artillery fire. There he successfully maintained liaison with the advance troops and the artillery in the rear by means of signals sent from his exposed position. His absolute disregard for his own safety contributed largely to the success of the engagement.

- First lieutenant, 49th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
With a patrol of six other machines, Lieutenant Kinney attacked 17 enemy planes (type Fokker). Diving into the midst of the enemy formation, he fired into one of the German planes and pursued it until it crashed to the ground, though he was wounded by another Fokker which attacked him from the rear. After maneuvering to escape his pursuer, he immediately attacked another enemy plane directly in front of him and forced it to the ground. In so doing he was fired upon from behind by another Fokker, several bullets striking him in the body and another setting fire to his gas tank. He succeeded in making a safe landing. This gallant officer has since died of his wounds. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. M. P. Kinney.

- Sergeant, Company B, 105th Infantry, 27th Division.
During the operations against the Hindenburg line Sergeant Kirk, with an officer and 2 other sergeants, occupied an outpost position in advance of the line which was attacked by a superior force of the enemy. Sergeant Kirk assisted in repulsing this attack and in killing 10 Germans, capturing 5, and driving off the others. The bravery and determination displayed by this group was an inspiration to all who witnessed it.

- Sergeant, Company H, 361st Infantry, 91st Division.
He was a member of a patrol sent out to reconnoiter the town of Audenarde. This patrol discovered several enemy machine-gun sniper posts, located in buildings, which were enfilading the streets of the town. Taking another soldier with him and dodging from building to building, he entered one of these houses and captured 2 machine gunners.

- Private, first class, Section No. 647, Ambulance Service.
While he was loading his ambulance at an advanced dressing station he was struck in the back by a shell fragment and rendered unconscious. Upon recovering he drove his car through heavy shellfire back to the field hospital and made repeated trips until he was relieved. Two days later, arriving at a point on the road near an advanced post, he saw a shell strike in the middle of an infantry detachment moving up to the line. He stopped his car and, despite continuous and intense shelling, loaded on 3 wounded soldiers, carried them to the nearest aid station, returned, and continued the work of evacuation until relieved.

- Private, Company F, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Private Kirschenbaum carried numerous messages through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire from the front-line companies to battalion headquarters. Due to his efforts communications were maintained during the period when his organization was successfully defending its position against powerful enemy attack. On one of his trips he captured 3 enemy prisoners, who had infiltrated through our lines.

- Corporal, Machine Gun Company, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
Advancing with 2 squads in front of the company to which he was attached, after being twice stopped by enfilading machine-gun fire and losing half his detachment, Corporal KJose continued to lead his squad through the woods, and put out of action an enemy machine gun which had been holding up the advance of the Infantry. This soldier had been wounded twice within the 3 preceding days, but continued in action, refusing to be evacuated.
- Private, Company F, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
Private Klanska, at great personal risk, voluntarily left his shelter and went 100 yards into an open field swept by heavy machine-gun fire and brought in a wounded man on his back.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Henry J. Klanska.
- Corporal, 314th Ambulance Company, 304th Sanitary Train, 79th Division.
He went through heavy shellfire into a burning dressing station which he knew contained a large quantity of ammunition, in order to rescue 2 wounded German prisoners. He succeeded in carrying them to safety.
- Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 362d Infantry, 91st Division.
Private Klaviter, a runner and signalman, while carrying a message to the attacking battalion, encountered an enemy machine-gun nest. Single-handed he killed 2 of the German machine gunners and captured 6 others, together with their gun, ammunition, and belts. The prisoners were then turned over to some other soldiers and forced to carry a wounded officer to the rear, while Private Klaviter continued on his mission.
- Private, Battery E, 10th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
He was acting as telephone operator at a gun in a detached position when all the crew became casualties. With another soldier he courageously continued to fire the piece under the heaviest bombardment until it was struck by a shell and he was killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Reinholdt T. Kleiber.
- Corporal, Company A, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
On Sept. 29, after locating the position of 3 enemy machine guns, he succeeded in silencing 1, took up a position against the other 2 under intense shellfire, and sent back information to his company commander which made it possible to clean out the entire nest. On Oct. 3, although wounded seriously, he continued to assist his men in repulsing the attack of an enemy patrol.
- Sergeant, Company H, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
With the aid of 6 comrades, Sergeant Klick attacked and put out of action a machine gun which was checking the advance of his company. Later he captured, without aid, about 20 prisoners, and while advancing against another nest he was twice wounded. Although in severe pain, he declined the use of a litter, walking 3 kilometers to a dressing station.
- Private, first class, Company G, 320th Infantry, 80th Division.
While his platoon was being forced back he remained to bind up the wounds of a comrade, although he himself was suffering from a painful wound. He then refused to be taken to the rear until all the others had been evacuated.
- Private, first class, medical detachment, 341st Machine Gun Battalion, 89th Division.
Attached to a company immediately behind the assault battalion of Infantry, he worked unceasingly, giving first-aid treatment to the wounded in his vicinity in an area constantly swept by intense fire from all arms. Displaying the highest devotion to duty and disregard for his own safety, he frequently worked in plain view of the enemy.
- Second lieutenant, 11th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division.
While the Infantry was falling back 200 meters to take cover from heavy artillery and machine-gun fire he, with his platoon sergeant, stayed at their 1 remaining machine gun, which they continued to operate for 45 minutes, until the Infantry position was reestablished. They not only successfully covered withdrawal of the Infantry, but also captured a German machine gun and 3 prisoners.
- Sergeant, Company D, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.
Picking up a light Maxim gun and ammunition left by the retreating enemy, he advanced in front of his company's line and supported it with enfilading fire so effectively that he was soon made the target for many German guns. With the utmost coolness and entire disregard for his own safety he continued to give appreciable support with his captured gun until he was killed by the hostile machine-gun fire. His example of bravery and audacity was an inspiration to the whole command.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Miss Ruth Kline.
- Corporal, Company K, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
Corporal Kling courageously led a detachment of 20 men against a machine-gun position on the right flank of the company, which was causing heavy losses. During the attack all others of Corporal Kling's detail became casualties, but he continued on alone. Gaining an advanced position in a shell hole, he kept the enemy machine gun under continuous fire until reinforcements arrived and captured it.

- Captain, 1st Cavalry, U. S. Army.
Though severely wounded, he refused to leave the firing line, but continued to lead his troop until exhausted from excessive loss of blood. His great fortitude and fearless conduct was an inspiring example to his men.
- Sergeant, Company L, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
His platoon having been relieved from its position in the front lines, Sergeant Knox remained with the relieving platoon, which was without a commissioned officer, organized and maintained its position during a severe attack by enemy infantry, bombers, and machine-gun fire. Though his platoon was entirely surrounded and cut off from support, and he himself twice wounded by shrapnel and grenades, he led his men against the enemy, broke through their lines, and established contact with the units on his right. His coolness, leadership, and outstanding courage under intense enemy fire greatly inspired his men and spurred them on to great endeavors in the face of vastly superior numbers.
- Private, Company M, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.
He succeeded in establishing an automatic rifle post under heavy machine-gun fire. In the face of this heavy fire he continually advanced until he was killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Joseph B. Kobernat.
- Corporal, Company A, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
With the help of only one other soldier Corporal Koch successfully attacked a German machine-gun nest from the flank, killing 7 Germans, wounding 1, and capturing 3 machine guns.
- Corporal, Company K, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
Ordering his squad to take cover, Corporal Koehanic single handedly rushed an enemy machine gun and killed the 2 Germans manning it. As he was turning the captured gun on the enemy the courageous soldier was killed by a sniper.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Walter Koehanic.
- Sergeant, Company F, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
He was killed on July 29, 1918, when establishing an outpost beyond the edge of Seringes-et-Nestes, which had just been captured by our forces. Throughout the attack he led his section of automatic riflemen with the greatest gallantry, giving an example of courage and bravery that was an inspiration to the men of his command.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Charles Koehensparger.
- First lieutenant, 146th Infantry, 37th Division.
Lieutenant Kochli, with 2 noncommissioned officers, advanced 200 yards beyond the objective of the patrol in the face of heavy machine-gun fire and captured three 77-millimeter fieldpieces and 2 light machine guns.
- Private, Company A, 1st Engineers, 1st Division.
Operating without assistance a machine gun which he secured by crawling out ahead of our lines, he successfully resisted a greatly superior force of the enemy, killing several and causing the rest to retreat. When wounds in the shoulder made it impossible for him to further operate the gun he rendered it unserviceable with a pick handle before retiring and reporting to his company commander.
- Captain, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
After being severely wounded while leading his men through an intense barrage, Captain Koepfel refused to leave his company until they had been established on the front line and all orders and instructions turned over to the next in command.
- Corporal, Headquarters Company, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
Under heavy machine-gun fire he crept up to a church and captured 4 of the enemy, who were operating machine guns from the building.
- Second lieutenant, 15th Machine Gun Battalion, 5th Division.
After his platoon had suffered heavy casualties in the Bois-des-Rappes from machine-gun fire he located the enemy guns, and, rallying a handful of his men, charged the enemy positions, capturing 37 prisoners. After getting his own machine guns in position Lieutenant Kofmehl, seeing that one of his gunners had been wounded, operated the gun himself, setting an excellent example to his men.
- Private, medical detachment, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
In spite of the fact that he had been severely wounded himself near Soissons, France, July 18, 1918, he refused to be relieved and continued to treat wounded under fire for 2 days.

 G. O. No. 46, W. D., 1919.
 Private, Company C, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
 Private Kolonoczyk, under heavy shell and machine-gun fire, left the shelter of his trench and, going forward under a thick smoke screen, single handed captured between 30 and 40 German prisoners. His conspicuous gallantry and bravery upon this occasion showed a heroic disregard for his own safety, which was a splendid example for all.
 Oak-leaf cluster.
 Private Kolonoczyk is also awarded an oak-leaf cluster for the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near St. Souplet, France, Oct. 18, 1918: After the advance of his company had been stopped by strong hostile machine-gun fire, he, with 3 companions, advanced far ahead of the front line to attack an enemy position located in a large farmhouse. By skillful maneuvering in the broad daylight, they covered all entrances to the house and forced the surrender of the entire force of the enemy, numbering 36 men and 2 officers. During the exploit they killed 2 Germans who attempted to take cover in the cellar.

 G. O. No. 46, W. D., 1920.
 Sergeant, Company L, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
 While leading a small patrol in an endeavor to establish liaison with the French troops on the right, during an attack, Sergeant Korgis's patrol was subjected to short-range machine-gun fire from 2 enemy guns. The fire halted their advance, whereupon Sergeant Korgis designated a few men to fire upon the enemy from the front, while he led the remainder in a flank attack upon the enemy, charging the post, killing the enemy crew of 8 with grenades, and capturing their guns. On Nov. 5, when an attack section became disorganized due to surprise fire from enemy machine guns, Sergeant Korgis fearlessly exposed himself to this fire and rushed to the "panic stricken" section and conducted them to cover, reorganized them, and subsequently led them in an attack upon the enemy position.

- First sergeant, Company C, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.
He displayed great gallantry during the operations against the Hindenburg line. A smoke barrage was put down by the enemy between his company and the company on the left. The company commander having been wounded, Sergeant Krause sent a soldier to establish liaison with the company on the left. When this soldier was severely wounded and unable to accomplish his mission, Sergeant Krause went himself and succeeded in reaching the company. While returning to his own company Sergeant Krause met a party of Germans attempting to break through the gap between the two companies. In a personal encounter he killed a German officer and forced the rest of the party to withdraw.

- Second lieutenant, 107th Engineers, 32d Division.
He was sent on the night of Aug. 5-6, 1918, to make a reconnaissance of all possible means of crossing the River Vesle, near Fismes, France. It had been reported that the Germans had all retreated from the south bank of the river, but he found that such was not the case; they were there in force. Nevertheless, such was his bravery and determination that he crossed into and through the German lines, made a full reconnaissance, and returned with his report.

With utter disregard for personal safety, subjected to intense machine-gun fire, he coolly reorganized the men about him, most of whom were replacements who had never been in action. Although lost and without maps he led his men in vigorous attacks against the enemy forests and well placed machine-gun nests, eventually reaching his objectives where he reestablished liaison with his flanks and continued the advance. By his fearlessness and aggressiveness he prevented the enemy from gaining advantage of a gap which was starting to open in our attacking line, and by his initiative aided the advance of the troops on his flanks. |

- Corporal, Company D, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
He led his squad against an enemy machine gun which was causing severe losses in his company. His journey was made through a very difficult terrain and under deadly fire, but his mission was accomplished without the loss of a man. Later in the day he was killed while leading his squad.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Margaret Lavoie.
- Corporal, Company G, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.
In the face of heavy machine-gun fire, Private Lawhorne, with 2 other soldiers, attacked and put out of action an enemy machine-gun post, capturing a German officer and 3 soldiers.
- Sergeant major, Headquarters Company, 39th Infantry, 4th Division.
When it had become necessary to send an urgent message to the battalion base company, Sergeant Major Lawless, though under fire for the first time, voluntarily took the message across an open field, a distance of 500 yards. It seemed almost impossible to get through the murderous fire, but, knowing the importance of the message, Sergeant Major Lawless ventured through rather than take the longer yet safer route. He completed his mission, returning over the same course.
- Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 310th Infantry, 78th Division.
During a raid Sergeant Lawless bayoneted the men at 2 enemy machine guns which were firing upon our raiding party and put several others out of action with hand grenades.
- First lieutenant, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
Being the only officer left with the company, Lieutenant Lawlor was ordered to clear a village of the enemy. Most of his command became separated from him in a dense fog, but with his 1 remaining squad he proceeded to accomplish his mission. Lieutenant Lawlor and 1 soldier came upon 100 Germans operating machine guns from behind a hedge and succeeded in capturing 50 of the enemy. This officer then pursued the others, exchanging shots with a German officer as he ran.
- Major, Medical Corps, attached to 368th Infantry, 92d Division.
Major Lawrence, with 2 soldiers, voluntarily left shelter and crossed an open space 50 yards wide, swept by shell and machine-gun fire, to rescue a wounded soldier, whom they carried to a place of safety.
- Sergeant, Company B, 108th Machine Gun Battalion, 28th Division.
When the advance of the platoon commanded by him was held up by machine-gun fire from the front and flanks, Sergeant Lawrence took a rifle and bayonet and, accompanied by another soldier, crawled under the enemy wire in the face of severe fire, drove off the crews of several enemy machine guns and returned with 2 prisoners, thereby enabling his platoon to rush on. Subsequently, under heavy machine-gun and sniper fire, he went along the line of his gun emplacements cheering and encouraging his men, his fearlessness affording an inspiration to them throughout the engagement.
- Private, Company K, 312th Infantry, 78th Division.
While his company was seeking shelter from a continuous rain of machine-gun bullets, Private Lawrence voluntarily carried messages from his company commander, who was lying wounded under enemy observation, to battalion headquarters. He worked under heavy bombardment at all times, but showed remarkable courage and devotion to duty while thus engaged.
- Corporal, 319th Ambulance Company, 305th Sanitary Train, 80th Division.
While he was passing along the roads leading to Septsarges, near Gercourt, in an ambulance, a large shell fell among a group of infantry soldiers near by, severely wounding 5 of them. He stopped the ambulance and rendered efficient first aid, through concentrated shellfire. He then loaded the patients in the ambulance and removed them from the shelled area.
- Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.
Having been wounded by a burst gun shell immediately after the opening of the attack, he refused to go to the rear, but remained with his corporal, who had been severely wounded by the same shell. For 2 hours, under an intense enemy barrage, he continued to minister to his wounded comrade until another shell burst near by, by which he was fatally wounded.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Bud Lawson.
- Corporal, Company L, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
When it was reported that the enemy had crossed the Marne River, Corporal Lawson twice led a patrol across his platoon front through heavy shellfire and at the risk of his life. On July 15, 16, and 17 he worked day and night unceasingly until forced to stop from complete exhaustion, displaying at all times the highest coolness and judgment and rendering services of the greatest value.

- Captain, observer, 91st Aero Squadron, Air Service.
This officer showed rare courage on a reconnaissance far over the enemy lines when he continued on his mission after being seriously wounded by anti-aircraft fire. On Sept. 13, although he was still convalescing from his wound, he volunteered for a particularly dangerous mission requiring a flight of 75 kilometers within the enemy lines. Because of weather conditions he was forced to fly at a dangerously low altitude and was repeatedly fired on by anti-aircraft and machine guns. He successfully accomplished his mission and returned with important information.
- Mechanic, Company D, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
While passing through the German lines at night, carrying messages, Mechanic Lay captured 8 of the enemy, including 2 officers, and marched them back 4 kilometers. The next day he carried messages through artillery and machine-gun fire and fearlessly exposed himself to danger in guiding companies into position. While returning from a mission he carried a severely wounded comrade through a machine-gun barrage to the dressing station.
- Private, Battery B, 10th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
He continued on duty repairing breaks in telephone line, even after being severely wounded and almost unconscious.
- Colonel, 151st Field Artillery, 42d Division.
Near Pexonne, France, on Mar. 5, 1918, he entered the quarry of Battery C, 151st Field Artillery, then subjected to particularly accurate artillery bombardment, for the purpose of directing and encouraging the officers and men of that battery, when he might with propriety have sent his directions by messenger.
- Sergeant, Company H, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
While his unit was in close contact with the enemy, a spy circulated a report that the company had been ordered to withdraw. Those who thus retired were shot down by the enemy. During the disorder that followed, Sergeant Leach fearlessly reorganized the platoon under close-range enemy fire. Due to his heroic example, the men of his platoon held their ground and repulsed the strong enemy attack which followed.
- First lieutenant, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
About 6.30 in the morning of Sept. 29 Lieutenant Leach received a serious wound which rendered his right arm useless. Notwithstanding his suffering and weakness from loss of blood he continued to lead his platoon toward its objective until after 1 o'clock of that day, when he became so exhausted and weak that he was ordered to the aid station by his commanding officer and from there was evacuated to the hospital.
- Colonel, 358th Infantry, 90th Division.
Under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, Colonel Leary personally led 2 sections of machine guns and 2 platoons of Infantry to the assistance of 1 of his battalions in order to protect its flank.
- Captain, 316th Engineers, 91st Division.
He led a patrol of 4 men on a reconnaissance of the city of Audenarde at a time when it was still occupied by enemy patrols and snipers, obtaining important data on destroyed bridges and locating materials necessary in repairing them. While on this errand Captain Leavell and his men encountered a German patrol 3 times their number, and in the combat which followed several of the enemy were killed or wounded and a spy was captured.
- Corporal, Company D, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
When ordered on an exploiting party  $1\frac{1}{2}$  kilometers in advance of our lines, he first reconnoitered the route and then led his men forward under heavy fire from the enemy artillery and machine guns. He held the position he established, under heavy fire, until relieved, 14 hours later.
- Sergeant, Company A, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
Although very seriously wounded, he refused aid of his men, who stopped to assist him, ordering them forward and directing their attack until they had passed beyond hearing distance.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to niece, Mrs. Gertrude Holland.
- Private, Company L, 104th Infantry, 26th Division.
During the action of Apr. 10, 1918, he displayed courage, coolness, and the spirit of self-sacrifice in voluntarily going through shell-swept area to bring back wounded to a place of safety, carrying 1 wounded man more than 50 yards under heavy shell fire.
- First lieutenant, 364th Infantry, 91st Division.
On the afternoon of September 28 he advanced with his platoon to Tronsol Farm under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire and captured 7 machine guns and much ammunition. Forced to retire, he returned with his capture and platoon in good order. On Oct. 31, while attempting to locate machine-gun nests which were holding up his advance, he was so severely wounded that in spite of his desire to continue he was unable to do so.

- Corporal, 43d Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
During an advance of his company he volunteered to carry a wounded comrade to a place of safety through hostile machine-gun fire. He later brought a wounded soldier from no man's land through a heavy machine-gun and artillery barrage.
- Major, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
While his battalion was engaged with the enemy on the heights near Sedan he left his advance command post, went forward in the face of heavy enemy machine-gun and artillery fire, where he personally supervised the successful reduction of enemy machine-gun positions and strong points. Later in the engagement, when his battalion was under a heavy frontal and flanking fire of machine guns, rifles, and direct artillery fire from high ground, he again left his advance command post, and with the utmost disregard for his personal safety advanced into the assault waves, traversed them, encouraging his men, and assisted the company officers in bringing such effective fire upon the enemy as to enable the battalion to advance upon their objective in the minimum time and with the least possible loss of life. His gallant and courageous conduct was an inspiration to his command and in a large measure responsible for the success of the 28th Infantry in the operations against Sedan.
- Private, Company D, 361st Infantry, 91st Division.
He voluntarily and unhesitatingly left shelter under heavy shellfire and without thought of personal danger rendered first aid and carried a wounded comrade to a place of safety.
- Private, first class, Company F, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
In the attack on Hill 253 Private Leeker took command of his platoon after the platoon leader and the sergeant had become casualties. He reorganized the platoon under fire and fearlessly led it to its objective. He fell mortally wounded while leading his men in the attack.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Sadie Leeker.
- Captain, 359th Infantry, 90th Division.
In the face of intense machine-gun fire, Captain Leeper led his company forward to its objective, capturing a machine-gun nest and making possible the capture of a strong enemy position on a hill. He was severely wounded during these operations, but his courage was an inspiration to his men in consolidating their position.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Leonora O. Leeper.
- Second lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He displayed exceptional bravery in organizing and leading a party of volunteers through heavy machine-gun fire for the purpose of securing 2 wounded men on the Lucy-Torey Road June 6, 1918.
- Major, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
Personally leading an attack against a strong enemy position, he inspired his men by his courage, cutting his way through entanglements and directing the attacks against 3 different strong points.
- First sergeant, Company L, 58th Infantry, 4th Division.
Although painfully wounded in the foot on Oct. 4, First Sergeant Legnosky remained on duty with his company. After his company commander had been killed he assumed command of the company and efficiently led it in action until the unit was released on Oct. 7, 1918. He repeatedly exposed himself to heavy fire in order to better control his men.
- Sergeant, Company B, 311th Infantry, 78th Division.
After his patrol had disposed of 2 sniper posts with rifle grenades he held his group in position and covered the withdrawal of his platoon from heavy enflading machine-gun fire of the enemy.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John Lehy.
- First lieutenant, 326th Infantry, 82d Division.
Under terrific fire he led his platoon across the Aire River, formed them on ground devoid of cover, and, though he had suffered 50 per cent casualties, led the survivors in a charge against the enemy, falling mortally wounded at the head of his men.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Della M. Leiboult.
- Private, Company M, 11th Infantry, 28th Division.
While his company was withdrawing to a place of safety Private Leiter stopped in a most exposed position and picking up a badly wounded man he continued in the withdrawal until the point of assembly was reached, at which time he brought him to a dressing station.

- Sergeant, Company A, 9th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.
 Though the two Infantry platoons to which he was attached had been reduced to but 15 men, Sergeant Lemieux stuck to his position with his 2 guns, and, in order to obtain a better field of fire, placed them on top of a railroad embankment in plain view of the enemy under intense machine-gun and shell fire. From here he maintained a deadly fire upon enemy boats crossing the Marne River, sinking several, killing the occupants of others, and forcing several to turn back. He also wiped out several enemy platoons which were preparing to cross the river. His guns were twice buried by bursting shells, but each time he calmly cleared the guns and immediately resumed firing. His gallant stand contributed materially to the successful defense of the sector.

- Captain, 88th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
He volunteered on a mission to protect a photographic plane for another squadron on Sept. 14 and continued toward the objective at Conflans even after 3 other protecting planes had failed to start. In an encounter with 5 enemy pursuit planes he completely protected the photographic plane by skillful maneuvering, although his observer was wounded and his machine seriously damaged. On Oct. 30, while on duty as Chief of Air Service of the 3d Army Corps, he volunteered and made an important reconnaissance of enemy machine-gun emplacements at a low altitude near Doulecon.
- Corporal, Company K, 325th Infantry, 82d Division.
Corporal Littlefield was a member of a detachment which had been surrounded by the enemy and had fought for several hours against overwhelming odds. When the officer in charge was about to surrender to the enemy, this soldier refused to do so and, dashing through severe machine-gun and rifle fire, succeeded in making his escape, though he was painfully wounded in the face in so doing. Reporting to his company without delay, he remained on duty throughout the entire operation.
- Captain, 6th Engineers, 3d Division.
He reorganized 3 Engineer companies after they had retired from the woods, and by his personal example of daring and bravery successfully led his men against enemy machine guns. His gallant action resulted in the capture of the Claire-Chenes Woods.
- First lieutenant, 104th Infantry, 26th Division.
As his battalion was advancing across an open field it came under fire from a hostile machine gun located in a strong enfilading position in a ravine. Hastily gathering a group of men from his platoon, Lieutenant Livermore led them in a charge on the nest and put it out of action, capturing 11 prisoners and saving his battalion many casualties.
- First lieutenant, 99th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Lieutenant Llewellyn, acting as pilot, and Lieutenant Neel, acting as observer, carried on successful liaison with the Infantry during the attack on Frapelle. They flew over the enemy lines at an altitude of only 400 meters, firing on and disconcerting the enemy, and thereby giving courage and confidence to the American forces. Despite heavy fire from 15 anti-aircraft machine guns and several batteries of anti-aircraft artillery, they performed their work efficiently. Their aeroplane was struck by a number of machine-gun bullets, one of which cut the rudder and elevator control wires and caused the rudder to jam. The broken control wire was held and operated by Lieutenant Neel, under direction of Lieutenant Llewellyn. Running the machine together in this manner they continued their liaison work until the plane began to become unmanageable, when, in spite of its damaged condition, they brought it back to their airdrome.
- Private, Headquarters Company, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
Advancing with front-line units, he established observation posts under heavy and continuous shell and machine-gun fire. Although suffering from wounds, he remained at his post and rendered valuable reports regarding the progress of the battle.
- Private, first class, Company L, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
Wounded while advancing under machine-gun fire, he showed highest devotion to duty by returning to his company as soon as he had obtained first-aid treatment. He crawled to a road, secured a pistol to replace the one he had lost when he was wounded, and joined a group which attacked a machine-gun nest, capturing the position and the machine gun.
- Sergeant, Company C, 2d Field Signal Battalion, 1st Division.
Leading a detail through an intense bombardment, Sergeant Lockard kept in operation the telephone lines of regimental headquarters, thereby enabling his regimental commander to keep in touch with elements on the firing line.
- Corporal, 51st Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Killed in action at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Locke.
- Sergeant, Company A, 129th Machine Gun Battalion, 35th Division.
Accompanied by another soldier, Sergeant Locke went through heavy fire, and by skillful maneuvering located and captured an enemy 77-millimeter gun with part of its crew, which had been checking the advance of our troops.
- Second lieutenant, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
On July 18, 1918, he gallantly inspired his platoon to 3 vigorous and successful advances against machine-gun fire near Soissons, France, in the last of which he was killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. James C. Loder.

- Corporal, Company F, 311th Infantry, 78th Division.
Corporal Loomis volunteered to lead a 3-man patrol on a reconnaissance of enemy positions. After one of his men had been wounded, he continued on with the other one and gained the information sought. Being wounded on the return trip by fire from machine guns, he was forced to remain under cover until night, when he located his other wounded man and returned under cover of darkness with valuable information.
- First lieutenant, 132d Machine Gun Battalion, 36th Division.
During an attack to straighten the front of the 71st Brigade, Lieutenant Loomis, in command of a machine-gun platoon, upon arriving at the objective, discovered that all of the Infantry officers in the vicinity had fallen, thus leaving their troops in confusion. Although under a heavy barrage of high-explosive and gas shells, machine-gun and rifle fire, Lieutenant Loomis removed his gas mask in order that his voice might carry, and, with great coolness, reorganized the Infantry forces, thus enabling them to hold the ground they had gained. Lieutenant Loomis remained in command until he was so severely gassed that he had to be carried from the field.
- Private, Company B, 15th Machine Gun Battalion, 5th Division.
Private Lord, although wounded severely early in the action and suffering great pain, refused to quit his gun squadron, but advanced with it until its objective was reached.
- Second lieutenant, 115th Machine Gun Battalion, 30th Division.
When his gun positions were rendered untenable by shellfire and his men ordered to seek shelter in dugouts, Lieutenant Loring left a place of safety for the purpose of seeing that all of his men were under cover and was mortally wounded by a shell, dying on his way to the hospital.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Viola Shaw Loring.
- Private, first class, Company H, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
As a runner he showed absolute disregard for personal danger in carrying messages across areas swept by artillery and machine-gun fire, maintaining liaison between his company and battalion commander.
- Private, 83d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
While passing through an unusual barrage of artillery fire and machine guns he had his leg broken by a bullet. Undaunted, he dragged himself to the post of command and reported to his company commander that his mission had been completed, thus saving the dispatch of another runner.
- Corporal, Company C, 100th Infantry, 28th Division.
Two different times, near St. Agnan, France, July 16, 1918, he preceded his platoon into enemy wire under fire, cut a path for it, and returned and led it through the gaps thus made.
- Private, Company B, 112th Engineers, 37th Division.
Private Loucks, with 2 other soldiers, crossed the Scheldt River after 2 attempts and succeeded in stretching a line for a bridge across the stream. They were discovered and fired upon by the enemy, but they continued at work driving stakes and made a second trip across the river to obtain wire, despite the fact that a violent artillery barrage had been laid down on their position.
- Major, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Although severely wounded, Major Lough continued to lead his battalion to his objective and refused to be evacuated until his battalion was relieved.
- Captain, 322d Infantry, 81st Division.
At the sacrifice of his own life he went forward through heavy machine-gun fire to locate a nest of machine guns which was holding up the advance of the regiment. He located the machine guns so that the 1-pounders could silence them, but was killed by the enemy machine-gun fire.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Eleanor K. Loughlin.
- Private, Company K, 59th Infantry, 4th Division.
Volunteering for a dangerous liaison mission, he went out alone, crossing an open space for 400 yards, which was swept by heavy machine-gun fire. Going far in advance of our lines, he obtained the desired information and brought back a German prisoner. He was killed later in performance of duty by shell-fire.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Etta M. Love.
- Private, Machine Gun Company, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.
His left arm having been rendered useless by a shrapnel wound, Private Lovelace continued to carry ammunition with his other arm until the objective was reached, when, against his protests, he was ordered to the rear for medical treatment.

G. O. No. 15, W. D., 1923.
Captain, 316th Infantry, 79th Division.
The attacking forces of his regiment having been checked in their advance by strongly held enemy positions, a temporary withdrawal of the advance elements was ordered in order that the supporting artillery might lay down a barrage in the woods occupied by the extreme front-line elements. Upon learning that the order for withdrawal had apparently failed to reach a few of his men who still remained in the woods, Captain Lukens himself made his way to the woods, under a hail of enemy machine-gun fire, found his men, and directed them to places of comparative safety, and, while so engaged, was himself killed by enemy machine-gun fire. His superb devotion to the men of his command served to incite them to heroic endeavors. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Lewis N. Lukens.

- Private, first class, Battery C, 103d Field Artillery, 26th Division.
He went through a heavily shelled area to obtain medical aid for his wounded comrades, and, failing to do this, returned to the position to aid in evacuating them. While carrying a wounded man to a place of safety, 2 men who were assisting him were instantly killed; nevertheless, he continued at his task until the position was evacuated.
- Private, Headquarters Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Private Lyster, a runner, displayed exceptional courage in volunteering to carry important messages over terrain constantly swept by machine-gun and shell fire.
- Corporal, Company F, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
He voluntarily went out under a terrific machine-gun fire to the rescue of his commanding officer, who had been wounded.
- Private, Company L, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.
After all the other company runners had been evacuated because of wounds Private Maass, although himself wounded, refused to go to the rear and remained on duty, carrying messages through heavy shell fire and maintaining liaison with all four platoons until his company was relieved.
- Private, Company A, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
Having been severely wounded in the shoulder by shrapnel early in the attack, Private Mabe refused to leave his platoon and, after losing his rifle, armed himself with grenades and cleaned out numerous enemy dugouts. Not until his company had taken its position for the night did he go to the rear.
- Captain, 7th Engineers, 5th Division.
Although severely wounded, Captain McAdams remained on duty directing the construction of a pontoon bridge across the Meuse River under heavy shell and machine-gun fire.
- Corporal, Company D, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.
While a member of a patrol sent out to reconnoiter the banks of the Meuse River, and when all means of crossing the river had been destroyed, Corporal McAfee, with another soldier, volunteered to swim across, though the other side was held in force by the enemy. Before reaching the opposite bank, he was seized with a cramp, caused by the extremely low temperature of the water, and was drowned.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Oliver P. McAfee.
- Colonel, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
As a colonel, commanding the 38th Infantry, he displayed exceptional gallantry when his regiment, attacking without support on either flank, was stopped by severe machine-gun and artillery fire, by going ahead of the most advanced elements of his command, and in full view of the enemy, leading his men by force of his own example to the successful assault of Jaulgonne and the adjoining heights. Later in the day, when progress was again checked, he personally reconnoitered to within 50 yards of hostile machine-gun nests, and through information thus obtained was enabled to hold an advanced position with both flanks exposed, for more than 36 hours.
- Sergeant, Company B, 12th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division.
Exposing himself fearlessly to enflading machine-gun fire from the enemy, Sergeant McAndrew directed the placing of the guns of his section in such positions as to protect the advance of the Infantry and in so doing was fatally wounded. Despite the fact that one-half of his body was paralyzed as a result of his injury, he insisted upon remaining in command of his section until the action was over. He died in a field hospital shortly after being evacuated.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Charles Weyl.
- Private, 103d Ambulance Company, 101st Sanitary Train, 26th Division.
While giving first aid to a wounded soldier who had fallen in a wheat field in range of enemy fire he received 2 machine-gun bullets through the thigh. In spite of his injury he continued at work until the soldier's wounds had been properly dressed and endeavored to carry him out of danger, but fell exhausted from loss of blood.
- Sergeant, Company H, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
All of his superior officers having been killed or wounded, Sergeant Macarovsky took command of and organized his company, under heavy shell fire. He then led it to the attack, captured or killed many Germans, and put several machine-gun nests out of action.

- For extraordinary heroism in action near Fismes, France, Aug. 11, 1918. Under the protection of 3 pursuit planes, each carrying a pilot and an observer, Lieutenants Bernheimer and Jordan, in charge of a photo plane, carried out successfully a hazardous photographic mission over the enemy's lines to the River Aisne. The 4 American ships were attacked by 12 enemy battle planes. Lieutenant Bernheimer, by coolly and skillfully maneuvering his ship, and Lieutenant Jordan, by accurate operation of his machine gun, in spite of wounds in the shoulder and leg, aided materially in the victory which came to the American ships, and returned safely with 36 valuable photographs. The pursuit plane operated by Lieutenants Hitchcock and Burns was disabled while these two officers were fighting effectively. Lieutenant Burns was mortally wounded and his body jammed the controls. After a headlong fall of 2,500 meters, Lieutenant Hitchcock succeeded in regaining control of this plane and piloted it back to his airdrome. Lieutenants McClelland and Plummer were shot down and killed after a vigorous combat with 5 of the enemy's planes. Lieutenants Babcock and Palmer, by gallant and skillful fighting, aided in driving off the German planes and were materially responsible for the successful execution of the photographic mission.

- Sergeant, Company B, 312th Infantry, 78th Division.
Without regard for his own danger, Sergeant McGuire went to the rescue of a wounded comrade who was lying seriously wounded 100 yards in front of our lines. He carried him safely to the aid station, crossing and recrossing an area swept by intense artillery and machine-gun fire and under the direct observation of the enemy.
- Private, Company I, 326th Infantry, 82d Division.
With exceptional gallantry, he voluntarily went out into an area swept by heavy machine-gun fire to rescue a wounded sergeant, and succeeded in carrying the latter a considerable distance through heavy fire to a first-aid station.
- Private, first class, section No. 647, Ambulance Service.
He was on duty as driver of an ambulance at an advanced post on Apr. 19, 1918. During Apr. 19 and 20 he made several trips to and from a dressing station reached by an exposed road in daylight, for the purpose of bringing back wounded. On one of these trips the ambulance was blown from the road by the explosion of a shell and he was knocked unconscious by the shock. On recovering consciousness he returned on foot. Although suffering from an injury in the back and not yet recovered from the shock, he wished to return to duty the afternoon of the same day, but was not permitted to do so by the medical officers until the afternoon of the following day.
- First lieutenant, 109th Infantry, 28th Division.
Although painfully wounded shortly after his platoon began an attack, Lieutenant McGuire refused to be evacuated until his command was ordered to withdraw. He then saw that their position was firmly held before going to the rear for treatment. His personal heroism was an inspiration to his men.
- Corporal, 116th Ambulance Company, 104th Sanitary Train, 29th Division.
He worked for 4 days, fearlessly exposing himself to heavy enemy fire, in administering first aid and directing the evacuation of the wounded. By his conspicuous bravery and untiring energy he was an example to his men.
- Corporal, Headquarters Company, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
While leading a squad of ammunition carriers he was severely wounded. After a tourniquet had been applied to his wounds he ordered the second in command to continue with the work, refusing the aid of his comrades until their mission had been completed. While on his way to a hospital he died of his wounds.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Rose McGuire.
- First lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Lieutenant McHenry led his platoon through heavy machine-gun and artillery fire until he fell severely wounded. On Oct. 3, 1918, while leading his platoon in the attack on the strongly fortified enemy position before Blanc Mont, he fell mortally wounded.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John McHenry.
- Second lieutenant, Company E, 310th Infantry, 78th Division.
Seeing one of his men lying wounded in a shell hole in front of his main line, Lieutenant McIntyre passed through an intense barrage to his aid. Having bandaged his wounds, he brought back his man to a place of safety.
- Corporal, 130th Ambulance Company, 108th Sanitary Train, 33d Division.
After being severely wounded by the explosion of an enemy shell in the dressing station, he remained on duty, assisting in caring for the wounded until he fainted from loss of blood.
- First lieutenant, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
He organized his platoon into a carrying party and on two occasions brought up ammunition and supplies to the battalion in the front line, through heavy machine-gun, rifle, and shell fire. He was knocked down several times and once thrown into the Ourcq River, but successfully carried out his mission.
- Sergeant, Company A, 110th Engineers, 35th Division.
While a member of a platoon of wire cutters, he, with another sergeant, attacked and helped to capture an enemy machine-gun nest that was holding up our advance. One officer, 6 men, and 2 guns were taken in the face of intense machine-gun fire.
- Private, 55th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Corporal Montag and Privates McIntyre, Messinger, and Wood captured a machine gun which was holding up the 55th Company of Marines, killing the entire crew. To accomplish this hazardous and daring work it was necessary for them to expose themselves to the fire of this gun. Even though Corporal Montag and Privates McIntyre and Messinger were wounded during the advance, the party continued forward and succeeded.

Lieutenant Mack volunteered to leave St. Thibaut in broad daylight with another officer and a patrol of 10 men to reconnoiter the enemy's lines. Upon reaching the Vesle River Lieutenant Mack swam across it and arranged the rope by means of which the remainder of the patrol crossed the stream. He divided the patrol and, taking 5 men with him, advanced on the village of Bazoches, which was occupied by the enemy. He attacked enemy hiding places in an old house in which he encountered 4 Germans. Although under machine-gun fire, he gained valuable information, having actually penetrated the enemy's advanced posts, and with great skill withdrew his patrol. Lieutenant Mack and 4 of his men were wounded, 2 mortally.

- Captain, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.
He was an observer with the French when the enemy attack on the Marne River was started July 15, 1918. All the officers of an Infantry company having been killed or wounded, he voluntarily reorganized the remainder of the company and successfully fought his way through the enemy, upon 2 occasions being surrounded. In this operation he was badly gassed. At Apremont, Sept. 29, when his own company had reached its objective, he, finding that another company was without officers, voluntarily assumed command of it and led the first wave. In so doing he was wounded, but he continued in action until the objective was reached.

- Corporal, Company M, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
The platoon which he commanded being driven to shelter by intense enemy artillery and machine-gun fire and many of its members wounded, Sergeant McManus, with complete disregard for his own safety and disregarding this heavy fire, advanced in plain view of the enemy, rescued a wounded man of his platoon, and although he himself was severely wounded applied first aid and brought his wounded comrade back to a place of comparative safety, thereby saving the latter's life.
- First lieutenant, 24th Infantry, U. S. Army.
While in command of Company H, 24th Infantry, which was held up in the crossing of the Rio Grande de Cagayan, P. I., Dec. 7, 1899, by rifle fire from a well-intrenched enemy on the opposite bank, and being without rafts or boats with which to cross, Lieutenant McMaster volunteered to swim the river. Displaying great gallantry and utmost disregard of his own life, with a party of 5 men he swam the river in the face of a heavy rifle fire and with reinforcements which later joined him drove the enemy from their trenches and then through and out of the town, thereby making possible the further advance of his command.
- Private, Company A, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.
When his platoon encountered intense fire from hostile trench mortars and machine guns, he took up an exposed position on the flank and, with his automatic rifle, covered the withdrawal of the platoon to a protected position, sacrificing his life in so doing.

- Private, first class, section No. 622, Ambulance Service.
Having just been relieved after 48 hours of strenuous duty, he volunteered to drive an ambulance to an advanced regimental post under constant and intense fire. While engaged in this dangerous mission, he suffered a wound which necessitated amputation of his right leg.
- Private, first class, Company D, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
Under direct and heavy enemy machine-gun and artillery fire, Private McNamara repeatedly carried messages across open ground during the attack upon Landres-et-St. Georges. Accompanying a patrol Oct. 14, he was wounded in arm and leg, but continued on with the patrol, which penetrated the enemy lines, where he engaged in hand-to-hand fighting. While thus engaged he was mortally wounded and carried by his comrades to his own lines, where he died two days later. His splendid courage and devotion to duty inspired the men of his patrol to great endeavors.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Annie McNamara.

- Sergeant, Company L, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Sergeant Main, with an officer and another soldier of his company, attacked a patrol of 7 Germans who had captured 4 American soldiers, killed 1 of the Germans, and captured the others.
- Corporal, Company D, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
Accompanied by another soldier, he advanced on a German 77-millimeter gun which was enflading his company, and with an automatic rifle caused such heavy casualties among the enemy crew that they were forced to withdraw.
- Corporal, Company E, 34th Infantry, 7th Division.
Although suffering from 5 wounds, 1 of which caused the loss of a hand, Corporal Major refused to be evacuated. He remained in command of his squad throughout the day and night and crawled into position the following morning to aid in the repulse of a German attack. His conduct furnished a great inspiration to the men of his company.
- Private, Company F, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
He was wounded 3 times, but continued with the advance and kept up the operation of his automatic rifle despite his injuries until the objective had been attained.
- First sergeant, Company H, 364th Infantry, 91st Division.
Accompanied by another soldier he advanced against 2 machine guns and killed 2 of the mounters. This made possible the capture of 55 men who were in a trench 100 yards farther forward. Later in the same day he assisted an officer in leading a platoon which captured approximately 100 of the enemy.
- Corporal, Company I, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
He volunteered and carried a message from his company post of command to the battalion post of command through the thickest of the German barrage.
He was killed in action the same day.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Alexander Malichis.
- Private, Company H, 181st Infantry, 33d Division.
During an attack he worked out far ahead of our lines and personally killed 4 Germans and brought back 3 prisoners, 1 of them an officer. Later, he formed one of a raiding party and displayed marked skill and bravery aiding in the capture of 14 prisoners. Both these missions were carried out under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire.
- Sergeant, Company I, 353d Infantry, 89th Division.
He led his platoon with marked bravery and ability in an attack which resulted in the capture of 15 machine guns and 70 prisoners, more than 40 of the enemy being killed or wounded. Throughout the attack he showed great heroism, killing 2 of the enemy in hand-to-hand encounters.
- Corporal, Company D, 102d Machine Gun Battalion, 26th Division.
After all the other members of his squad had become casualties, he volunteered and led 2 other squads on a machine-gun nest, which he had located and put it out of action with the first burst of shot. Later he helped dress wounded men of his squad and evacuated them under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire. Although severely gassed the next day, he continued in the advance.
- Colonel, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
During the 2 days which his regiment was engaged with the enemy, Colonel Malone frequently visited the advanced troops. On the evening of July 18, after the regiment had suffered severe losses, he assisted in the reorganization of a battalion for the attack on Vierzy. On the morning of July 19 he made a personal reconnaissance of the front lines, under heavy fire, in order to ascertain the enemy position, which was of vital importance.
- Second lieutenant, 354th Infantry, 89th Division.
Leading an assault platoon, he encountered a nest of 6 enemy guns, which was pouring out a deadly fire from three directions. Rushing the guns in the immediate front, he captured them, as well as taking the crews as prisoners; and while thus engaged he was knocked unconscious by a bursting shell.
Regaining consciousness when picked up by first-aid men, he returned immediately and rejoined his platoon and directed operations until the objectives were reached.
- Corporal, Company B, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
Sent out alone to locate the position of snipers, and coming upon a machine-gun nest, he boldly attacked it single-handed, capturing the gun, wounding 1 of the crew, and taking 3 prisoners.
- Sergeant, Company E, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
When the advance of his company was halted by the fire from 4 machine guns from the front, Sergeant Manco led a patrol of 4 men, through heavy fire, to the flank and rear of the enemy position. He then attacked the enemy and captured the guns and crew.

- MANDERS, FRANK (3746337)-----
At Grand Pre, France, Nov. 1, 1918.
R—Rockland, Wis.
B—Kaukauna, Wis.
G. O. No. 56, W. D., 1922.
- Private, Company I, 312th Infantry, 78th Division.
After requesting that he be permitted to lead a detail for the purpose of recovering the body of a wounded comrade whom he had been forced to leave about 500 yards in front of their lines earlier in the day when on patrol duty, Private Manders led the detail [of 4 men under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire on its dangerous mission. After proceeding about 200 yards the detail felt that the expedition was hopeless on account of the extremely heavy fire. Private Manders, however, refused to give up and insisted on the detail going forward. By his own absolute disregard of personal safety and by his own example he so inspired the members of the detail that they went forward with him under the gravest danger for over 300 yards, recovered the wounded comrade, and made their way back to their own lines.

R—Nashville, Tenn.
B—Nashville, Tenn.
G. O. No. 98, W. D., 1919.
- Captain, 5th Infantry Brigade, 3d Division.
Captain Manier, brigade liaison officer, was at the command post of the assaulting battalion when word was received that the enemy had penetrated our line and was closing in on the command post. No reserves being available, Captain Manier assisted in hastily organizing a force of runners, a signalman and others, and himself taking a rifle led these men under heavy machine-gun and rifle fire in a counterattack on the advancing enemy. He succeeded in stopping the enemy and holding the position until the line was reestablished. As a result of his courage and initiative a large number of the enemy were captured and many killed or wounded, and the success of future operations assured.

- First lieutenant, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
Lieutenant Marsh, with a force of 50 men, took a line of trenches, at the same time capturing prisoners greatly in excess of the members of his own command. It was due to his gallant example that this feat was accomplished. He was killed by machine-gun fire as the trench was taken.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Nellie D. Marsh.
- Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Nellie D. Marsh.
First sergeant, Company K, 362d Infantry, 91st Division.
He was painfully wounded by a shell fragment, but refused to go to the rear.
Remaining with his company under heavy shell fire, he continued to perform his duties.
- Private, first class, Company K, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
After losing his ammunition carrier, Private Marsh advanced unaided and effectively operated his automatic rifle until wounded in the hand. He continued to fire until his ammunition was exhausted, and refused to go to the rear until ordered to do so.
- Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 363d Infantry, 91st Division.
Although suffering acute pain from a severe injury, he led his section through a continuous rain of machine-gun and sniper fire beyond the Infantry front line, where he encountered the enemy.
- Private, Company L, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
He displayed coolness and bravery in carrying numerous messages under shell fire, thereby keeping up liaison between adjacent units.
- Corporal, Company A, 1st Engineers, 1st Division.
He voluntarily went forward to silence a sniper who was pouring a dangerous fire into his position. He crept through brush for a distance of 300 yards and then crossed a machine-gun-swept area, killing the sniper with his rifle.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Henry L. Marshall.
- Second lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He demonstrated conspicuous bravery and coolness in fearlessly exposing himself to heavy fire from machine guns, rifles, and hand grenades in order that he might procure accurate information regarding the movements of the enemy.
- Private, Company A, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
After being wounded in the head and subjected to an intense barrage, he remained at his post for three hours, operating his automatic rifle, until ordered to the rear.
- First lieutenant, 58th Infantry, 4th Division.
When his company's advance was stopped by heavy enflading machine-gun fire, Lieutenant Marshall took 7 soldiers and rushed the enemy nest, killing 6 of the enemy and capturing 30, including a captain. Lieutenant Marshall accomplished this daring feat without any of his own men becoming casualties.
- First lieutenant, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.
Although seriously wounded, he continued to direct his command under heavy machine-gun and sniping fire and maintained organization under heavy demoralizing circumstances until he was killed by a sniper's bullet.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Edward A. Martell.
- Private, Company C, 31st Infantry.
He carried a message across a field under fairly heavy fire. He then volunteered to go to break up a sniper's nest, and went alone to an exposed and dangerous point where he could fire at the nest and broke it up, killing one of the snipers and driving the rest away.
- Captain, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
Captain Martie exposed himself to heavy artillery and machine-gun fire while leading his company forward in an attack against strongly held enemy positions. Reaching his objective, he organized his position for defense and held the same against enemy counterattacks.
- Private, Company I, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.
Exposing himself to heavy enemy machine-gun and artillery fire, he repeatedly carried messages from his company commander to the battalion post of command. He was killed in the performance of this hazardous duty.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Ettie Bryant.
- Captain, Medical Corps, attached to 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
He operated a battalion dressing station near Vaux, France, July 1, 1918, and, although the station was practically destroyed by shell fire, he bravely and successfully treated the wounded and directed their safe evacuation.

- Captain, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
On numerous occasions he personally headed every forward movement of his command, displaying superb courage in his absolute disregard for personal safety. In the attack on Juvigny the battalion commanded by this officer was called upon to execute a turning movement and effect junction with the French troops on the flank. Under the personal direction of Captain Martin this turning movement was completed across a hill strongly held by the enemy, its success being due to his initiative. During this engagement he was gassed and taken from the field unconscious.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Hattie E. Martin.
- Corporal, Company I, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
He led his platoon over the top until further advance was impossible. He then remained in observation. Upon being grenaded by two of the enemy, he shot them with his pistol and, moving forward, gained entrance to an unused "pill box." A few hours later he ventured out into enemy trenches, entered a near-by dugout, and disposed of 6 occupants, then retired to his former position in the "pill box," returning to his own lines after dark.
- Lieutenant colonel, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.
In command of an inexperienced battalion, he led an attack against a strongly held position, and advancing with the front line, raised the morale of officers and men by his coolness under heavy fire and utter disregard for personal danger.
Oak-leaf cluster.
For the following act of extraordinary heroism in action Lieut. Col. Edward Martin is awarded one oak-leaf cluster to be worn with the distinguished-service cross: For extraordinary heroism in action near Courmont, France, July 30, 1918. Although painfully wounded when regimental headquarters was destroyed by shell fire, he went with a battalion commander and directed the successful attack against a strong enemy position, remaining in command of the regiment until its relief.
- Captain, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
Captain Martin, although severely wounded in the right side, before reaching the first objective, refused to be evacuated and continued to direct his company in the attack through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire to the second and third objectives.
- Corporal, Machine Gun Company, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
When a battalion of Infantry was held up by heavy machine-gun fire, he rushed his section forward to a position 300 yards in advance of our front lines, engaged and silenced the enemy, and allowed a renewal of the advance. He displayed marked personal bravery under terrific enemy fire.
- Corporal, Company I, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.
He accompanied Lieut. John H. Murphy, of his regiment, and 3 other soldiers in a flank attack on 3 heavy machine guns. Fired on directly at 30 yards, they charged the guns, and met hand-to-hand resistance, but repulsed the enemy, capturing the guns. Corporal Martinez followed the fleeing Germans until they were lost in the fog.
- Private, Company K, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.
With 2 other soldiers Private Martinez crawled 300 yards in front of our line through the enemy's wire and attacked a hostile machine-gun nest. The enemy crew opened fire on them at a range of only 10 yards and resisted stubbornly, but they succeeded in killing 3 of the crew and driving off the others with clubbed rifles. They returned to our lines under heavy fire.
- Private, first class, Company E, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
During an enemy raid on the sector held by the 3d Platoon of Company E, 127th Infantry, which was preceded by a terrific and accurate barrage of high-explosive shells and machine-gun fire, and although surrounded by a superior enemy force, Private Martinson refused to surrender, but instead jumped from his trench and with his automatic rifle repulsed the enemy.
- Sergeant, Company C, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.
Under violent shell and machine-gun fire, Sergeant Martz assisted in reorganizing the remnants of his shattered company, which was surrounded by the enemy, and held the position until his group was again cut to pieces. With an officer and 2 other soldiers he then succeeded in fighting his way from within the enemy's lines to his regiment, killing a large number of the enemy with his pistol.
- Private, first class, Company C, 12th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division.
Private Martz and a comrade, under heavy enemy fire, went to the rescue of wounded lying in advance of our lines and returned to our lines with 2 wounded American soldiers. In accomplishing this mission they advanced to within 75 yards of the enemy lines over an area which the enemy raked with their fire.
- Captain, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
Having been sent to make a reconnaissance and if found necessary to take command of the 3d Battalion, 357th Infantry, the advance of which had just been checked with severe losses, he displayed the highest quality of courage and leadership in the face of a murderous artillery and machine-gun fire by immediately reorganizing the battalion and after a personal reconnaissance directing the assault line, which resulted in the taking of the enemy position. During the attack Captain Marx was severely wounded. His brave example greatly inspired his men.

- Private, Company E, 58th Infantry, 4th Division.
Acting without orders, he went through heavy artillery fire to notify his regimental commander that our own barrage was falling short, his bravery and presence of mind thus saving the lives of many American soldiers.
- Private, Company F, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
In an attack against a strong enemy position, supported by many machine guns, he, a runner, worked unceasingly in the maintenance of liaison and carried messages through the most severe machine-gun barrage. On his last trip from the regimental post of command he was severely shell shocked, but continued through the barrage to the battalion headquarters and delivered his message.
- Private, 43d Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
After all the other members of his group had been killed or wounded by fire from an enemy machine gun, Private Mathias charged the gun position alone, killing 3 of the crew and capturing the gun.
- First lieutenant, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
As a leader of a platoon on the first day of the Chateau-Thierry battle he demonstrated conspicuous courage and ability, fearlessly going forward at the head of his command through hostile machine-gun fire. Killed while leading a gallant charge, his daring inspired his men to successful assault.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Evan T. Mathis.
- Sergeant, Company M, 105th Infantry, 27th Division.
On the morning of Sept. 27, after all the officers and most of the sergeants of his company had been killed, Sergeant Matson took command and led the company into effective combat, making repeated reconnaissances in front of the line under severe machine-gun fire. On Sept. 29 he led his men forward, capturing an important knoll, and held it with a small number of men. Finding the ammunition and food depleted, he led a detail through the heavy machine-gun fire, bringing back both food and ammunition.
- Sergeant, Company C, 123d Machine Gun Battalion, 33d Division.
Voluntarily leaving the shelter of the trenches and exposed to terrific enemy machine-gun and artillery fire and under direct observation of the enemy, he rescued 3 wounded men, assisting them to a place of comparative safety. The outstanding bravery and soldierly devotion to duty displayed greatly encouraged the men of his company.
- Private, Company E, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.
After having been wounded and severely burned and gassed by an explosion of mustard-gas shell, he nevertheless continued at his work as stretcher bearer, evacuating wounded until he was actually unable to see and was ordered to be evacuated himself.
- First lieutenant, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
In plain view of the enemy he rode across a field to a friendly battery whose barrage was falling on the American trenches and stopped its fire, thereby permitting a reestablishment of the front line and saving many lives.
- Second lieutenant, 105th Machine Gun Battalion, 27th Division.
After having been wounded in the head and suffering great pain, he coolly and efficiently made dispositions for the security of his guns and safety of his men and the evacuation of the wounded. Later at a dressing station, though bleeding profusely, he refused surgical attention until other wounded men of his platoon had been cared for.
- First lieutenant, 139th Aero Squadron, 2d Pursuit Group, Air Service.
Accompanied by 2 other planes, Lieutenant Maughan was patrolling our lines, when he saw slightly below him an enemy plane (Fokker type). When he started an attack upon it he was attacked from behind by 4 more of the enemy. By several well-directed shots he sent 1 of his opponents to the earth, and, although the forces of the enemy were again increased by 7 planes, he so skillfully maneuvered that he was able to escape toward his lines. While returning he attacked and brought down an enemy plane which was diving on our trenches.
- Private, Company C, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.
Having heard that 2 wounded comrades were lying in advance of his company's line immediately north of Fismette, Private Maurer and 2 other members of his company volunteered to go through the machine-gun and rifle fire to bring them in. On their first attempt all were wounded and driven back, but in spite of their injuries they advanced a second time and reached the wounded men. Their courageous effort, however, was unfortunately in vain, as their comrades had been killed.
- Second lieutenant, 301st Battalion, Tank Corps.
Although his motor was running poorly and his tank crew badly gassed, Lieutenant Maury captured a German battery with his gun crews and turned it over to the Infantry. A little later his motor stopped completely, but he soon located another tank, whose crew was badly gassed. He transferred his ammunition and crew to the new tank and continued in the advance of our Infantry to the objective.

- Lieutenant colonel, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.
He advanced with first wave and, in the face of heavy shell and machine-gun fire, located the objective of his battalion. He was a cool, dependable, and heroic leader. Although fatally wounded, he gave detailed instructions to his second in command and caused himself to be carried to his regimental commander and delivered important information before he died.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Lu Knowles Maxey.
- Corporal, Company B, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
Corporal Maxie, in company with 4 other soldiers, attacked without support 8 machine guns, and, overcoming the desperate resistance of the enemy, captured both guns and crews.
- Sergeant, Company G, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
On his own initiative he rushed an enemy machine-gun nest, capturing the gun and 2 prisoners. He displayed marked personal courage under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, passing through the enemy barrage to get water and rations to the men in the front line.
- Corporal, Company B, 315th Train Headquarters and Military Police, 90th Division.
During a very heavy attack in the vicinity of his post, where artillery fire and aircraft machine-gun fire had created a most confusing situation, he calmly directed traffic, aided wounded, and removed obstructions, thereby preventing wild disorder. He also assisted the drivers of ammunition trucks in getting their machines to a place of safety.
- Private, first class, Company F, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
During a heavy shelling he volunteered and delivered messages over routes where all other runners had been either killed or wounded.
- Second lieutenant, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.
Without assistance, he very courageously attacked and captured a machine gun which threatened to wipe out his platoon.
- Captain, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.
Captain Mayes with 8 other soldiers, comprising his company headquarters detachment, cleaned out enemy dugouts along the banks of a canal, capturing 242 prisoners.
- First lieutenant, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
After his company had been forced to fall back because of heavy losses and his company commander had been seriously wounded, Lieutenant Mayer reorganized the remainder of the company and, under intense shell and machine-gun fire, led it in a successful attack on a machine-gun position which had been causing many casualties in the battalion.
- Private, medical detachment, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
Private Mayne, although in an exposed position in the Trugny Woods under fire of rifles and machine-guns, courageously treated the wounded, inspiring the combat troops by his example, until shot through the head and killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. May Mayne.
- Sergeant, Company C, 9th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.
Sergeant Mays, single-handed, operated a machine gun after the remainder of his squad had become casualties from enemy machine-gun fire. Although exposed to heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, he continued to fire his gun until assistance arrived.
- Sergeant, Company G, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.
Sergeant Mays, with 1 other soldier, attacked a machine-gun post which was causing much damage. They captured the post, taking prisoner 1 officer and 8 men, and put the gun out of action.
- Corporal, Company C, 5th Machine Gun Battalion, 2d Division.
He left the shelter of his trench to rescue soldiers who had been buried by the explosion of a shell. Shortly after, while conducting his men to cover, a shell exploded near by, severely wounding a member of his squad. Directing the remainder of the squad to take cover, he went to the assistance of the wounded man, and while rendering first aid was mortally wounded.

On the night of Oct. 10, 1918, he skillfully directed the construction of a pontoon bridge over the Loison River. So close to the enemy was his platoon that it was necessary to lash the bridge together, because the hammering of nails would have drawn instant machine-gun fire from the enemy.   |

- Private, first class, medical detachment, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
Throughout the engagement he tended the wounded under shell and machine-gun fire, continuing with his work after 2 of his assistants had been killed and 1 wounded.
- Private, Headquarters Company, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
By crawling forward alone across a clearing swept by German machine-gun fire and armed only with his rifle and bayonet, he killed 4 of the enemy who resisted him, and after clearing out several dug-outs in the woods returned with 8 prisoners and valuable information. His act of valor was instrumental in warding off a strong enemy counterattack.
- Private, medical detachment, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
During the day and night of Oct. 6 he constantly exposed himself under heavy fire, giving first aid to the wounded and assisting in their evacuation.
- First sergeant, Company A, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
Voluntarily leading a patrol for a flank attack on the town of Stonne, through unusual artillery fire and exacting machine-gun fire, Sergeant Mercer, leaving his patrol, went forward alone to draw fire from the nests in order to divert the enemy's attention from the attacking patrol.
- Pharmacist's mate, second class, U. S. Navy, attached to 43d Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He accompanied a company of marines during an advance under violent fire, going to all parts of the line, giving first aid to wounded and directing their evacuation. Although wounded, he remained on duty until forced to go to the rear.
- Captain, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
Despite the loss of all other officers in his company, and although wounded himself, he continued to direct his men effectively against the enemy. When his major was killed he succeeded to the command of the battalion and led it forward throughout the day with courage and gallantry.
- First lieutenant, 10th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
After the members of his telephone detail had been pressed into service as runners under a hostile bombardment so severe that telephone communication could not be maintained, he volunteered to drive an ambulance. He made three trips under terrific shellfire to evacuate wounded from Greves Farm.
- Private, Company E, 366th Infantry, 92d Division.
Although he was severely wounded, he remained at his post and continued to fight a superior enemy force which had attempted to enter our lines, thereby preventing the success of an enemy raid in force.
- Private, Company E, 312th Infantry, 78th Division.
With the remark, "I can get through and find him," Private Merrill volunteered and carried a message from his regimental commander to the commander of an advance battalion through a fire that seemed impassable. He returned with amazing promptness with an answer to the message. This soldier made several other trips on the same night, finding his way through a dark forest, actually walking on bodies of men who had fallen in the only path that could be used.
- Corporal, Company L, 372d Infantry, 93d Division.
He attacked with hand grenades an enemy machine gun which was causing heavy losses to his platoon and succeeded in killing the gunner and putting the gun out of action. He then organized the remainder of the platoon and led them to their positions in the trenches south of Bussy Farm.
- Private, Company C, 345th Battalion, Tank Corps.
While he was directing a column of tanks through a mine field, assisted by another soldier, his companion was wounded, but he continued with his work until all tanks had safely passed through. Returning, he assisted his wounded comrade to safety, after which he carried messages through an intense bombardment of artillery and machine guns.
- Sergeant, Company I, 312th Infantry, 78th Division.
After having established an observation post without aid in broad daylight and under perilous shellfire of the enemy, he volunteered and carried rations to the post under cover of darkness. Though knocked down by shell concussion, he reached every man who was unable to leave his post, and his entire exploit was carried out under most harassing machine-gun and artillery fire.

- First lieutenant, pilot, 8th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
He, with First Lieut. Gardner Philip Allen, observer, took advantage of a short period of fair weather during generally unfavorable atmospheric conditions to undertake a photographic mission behind the German lines. Accompanied by two protecting planes, they had just commenced their mission when they were attacked by 8 enemy planes, which followed them throughout their course, firing at the photographic plane. Lieutenant Moore, pilot, with both flying wires cut by bullets, a landing wire shot away, his elevators riddled with bullets, and both wings punctured, continued on the prescribed course, although it made him an easy target. Lieutenant Allen was thus enabled in the midst of the attack to take pictures of the exact territory assigned, and he made no attempt to protect the plane with his machine guns. Displaying entire disregard for their personal danger and steadfast devotion to duty, the 2 officers successfully accomplished their mission.

- Sergeant, Company C, 348th Machine Gun Battalion, 91st Division. Although wounded by the same shell which mortally wounded his platoon commander, he went to his company for assistance, returned through a heavy shell fire, and helped to carry his commander to a place of safety. He did not report his own wound, or receive medical attention until the officer had been cared for.
- Corporal, Company G, 111th Infantry, 28th Division. With an automatic rifle team, he occupied a house in an advanced position west of Fismette on the night of Aug. 12, the loss of which would have jeopardized his company's position and hindered the military operations then taking place. The enemy shot a flare into the house, setting fire to it, but Corporal Moore and a companion, under machine-gun and sniper fire in a brilliantly lighted room, extinguished the flames.
- Second lieutenant, 38th Infantry, 3d Division. Although severely wounded in the head by a machine-gun bullet, Second Lieutenant Moore continued in command of his platoon and by his courageous conduct repulsed a strong enemy counterattack against the line held.
- Corporal, Company E, 397th Infantry, 77th Division. During an attack, when his platoon encountered enemy wire, Corporal Moore calmly went forward and alone proceeded to cut a passage through the wire. While performing this work, he was subjected to the fiercest fire of enemy machine guns and grenades, which wounded over half the platoon. He continued in this work until he accomplished his purpose.
- First lieutenant, chaplain, 313th Infantry, 79th Division. Though wounded on Sept. 26, 1918, he remained with the attacking lines of his regiment, ministering to the dying and aiding the wounded. After entering an enemy trench with a group of men, a grenade was thrown in their midst, and, in utter disregard of personal safety, he grabbed the grenade to throw it from the trench. It exploded just after leaving his hand, seriously wounding him in several places.
- Private, first class, section No. 554, Ambulance Service. During this period Private Moore evacuated the wounded in an advance post under shell and sniper fire. On the nights of Oct. 6 and 7 he drove an ambulance to points beyond the advanced posts to carry in the wounded under intense shell and machine-gun fire. He also assisted the litter bearers in exposed positions in carrying the wounded from the lines to the dressing station.
- Second lieutenant, 3d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division. While courageously leading his section in the face of intense fire near Cutry, France, on July 18, 1918, he was knocked down by a shell explosion, but continued his leadership as soon as he regained consciousness and personally reconnoitered the area in advance to find a less dangerous route. He succeeded and thereby made it possible for his men to go forward, but he himself was killed in the undertaking. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. S. L. Moore.
- Sergeant, Company B, 124th Machine Gun Battalion, 31st Division. He led his section of 2 guns to the aid of an Infantry company. Failing in his attempt to establish an advantageous position, he alone took his gun 100 yards in advance of the line, exposed to violent machine-gun and artillery fire, and, setting it up in an open field, silenced the fire of enemy machine-gun snipers who had been inflicting heavy losses on our troops.
- Sergeant, Company H, 112th Infantry, 28th Division. As 1 of a group which was attacked by an overwhelming force of enemy, Sergeant Moore assisted in the defense of a crossing over the Vesle River and made possible the retirement of about 20 of his comrades. He continued against great odds to hold his position and inflicted heavy casualties upon the enemy, finally retiring under orders, fighting his way through heavy machine-gun, rifle, and artillery fire. His exceptional disregard for personal safety, resourcefulness, and bravery were an inspiration to all his comrades. Sergeant Moore was severely passed in this fight and died shortly thereafter. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, William T. Moore.
- Captain, 132d Machine Gun Battalion, 36th Division. Captain Moore, although wounded by shrapnel, refused to go to the rear, and proceeded to reorganize portions of 3 Infantry platoons whose officers had become casualties, thus protecting the right flank of the 141st Infantry. He went to the rear only after he had been severely gassed.
- Private, Company I, 118th Infantry, 30th Division. During the action of his company at Brancourt, he went out alone and attacked an outpost containing 1 officer and 8 men, capturing the entire party and turning them over as prisoners. On the following day he advanced alone 50 yards in front of his company to attack an enemy sniper who was placing an effective fire on our lines.
- Second lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. On June 6, 1918, he volunteered and took a truck load of ammunition and material into Bouresches, France, over a road swept by artillery and machine-gun fire, thereby relieving a critical situation.

While leading a patrol in front of our lines, Sergeant Moorefield and his patrol came under machine-gun and rifle fire, and 1 of his men was severely wounded. He crawled forward with his patrol until within 20 paces of an enemy gun, when, upon raising his head slightly, he saw the German who was feeding the ammunition to the gun. He shot the man through the head with his rifle and wounded another. When the German gun nearest him jammed he captured it and another near by, together with 3 prisoners. He jumped into the emplacement, cleared the jam in the gun, and turned it on the enemy guns on the right, silencing them. He then sent his patrol and the prisoners back into our lines, covering their retreat with 1 of the captured guns.

- First lieutenant, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
After advancing through 5 stages of artillery barrage and machine-gun fire, he led a patrol of 5 men forward to capture 2 machine guns which were endangering the success of the operation. Although seriously wounded in the chest and foot by machine-gun fire, he would not consent to being taken to the rear until the guns had been captured.
- First lieutenant, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.
He displayed notable courage and determination by leading his company to its objective through a heavy enemy barrage of high-explosive gas shells. Although gassed and wounded in the leg by a shell fragment, he remained in command of his company until it was relieved.
- Second lieutenant, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
On several occasions, during the advance of Sept. 12, he outmaneuvered enemy machine guns, capturing both guns and crew. On the night of Sept. 12-13 he led a patrol of 2 squads through the German lines, advancing over 1,000 yards to the front of the line of resistance, capturing a German battery, 1 noncommissioned officer, and 7 men. He then fought his way back through the enemy's lines, losing but 1 prisoner before meeting the advancing American troops.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Zetha De Berry Mudgett.
- Private, first class, Company F, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
Private Mueller, a runner, successfully maintained liaison between his company, which formed the liaison group with another division, and regimental headquarters, promptly carrying numerous messages across an area under heavy fire.
- Captain, 314th Infantry, 79th Division.
As regimental adjutant he displayed the utmost disregard for personal danger in assisting his regimental commander in maintaining liaison with the front lines. After being painfully wounded and gassed by a bursting gas shell, this officer refused to be evacuated, but remained on duty, carrying orders to the front line and bringing back valuable information, until he was ordered to the rear.
- First lieutenant, 2d Infantry, U. S. Army.
At the risk of his life, he voluntarily exposed himself to a heavy hostile artillery and infantry fire in a successful attempt as a sharpshooter to silence a piece of Spanish artillery at the battle of Santiago.
- Sergeant, Company G, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
He led his platoon against a machine-gun nest and continued to his objective after being wounded. He was instrumental in capturing 3 prisoners and 1 machine gun.
- Second lieutenant, 326th Infantry, 82d Division.
After having been severely wounded in the leg he continued to direct his men under terrific artillery fire in the attack against 2 enemy machine guns. Due to his initiative and gallantry the enemy position was captured.
- First lieutenant, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.
Lieutenant Mullen on Oct. 14, under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire personally led an attack on enemy machine-gun nests, capturing 3 machine guns and numerous prisoners. On Nov. 7 he attacked and captured an enemy machine-gun nest which was holding up the advance of his company, taking machine guns and 16 prisoners.
- Private, Company I, 114th Infantry, 29th Division.
Private Mulligan volunteered to carry a message from the firing line to the rear over a route commonly known as the "Valley of Death" under heavy machine-gun and shell fire. During the journey he was severely wounded in the thigh and leg, but delivered his message. Instead of waiting for treatment, Private Mulligan hopped and crawled back to the firing line with his answer.
- Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
After his gun crew had been bombed out of the emplacement by the enemy coming from the rear, Sergeant Mullins continued, with the aid of one man, to fire his gun, even after his hand had been wholly shot off.
- Private, Company H, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
When certain units of his company were halted by heavy enemy fire, he was sent to them successively, and displaying marked personal bravery and leadership carried them forward under heavy fire. He led 2 squads forward under heavy fire and flanked a machine-gun emplacement which had blocked his company's advance. In this undertaking he was mortally wounded.

- Sergeant, medical detachment, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
He voluntarily left his aid station and went to the field of action to deliver first aid to men in the most advanced positions. He tended the wounded under the most intense machine-gun and shell fire, and successfully carried a large number to places of comparative safety. His courage and cheerfulness under such hazardous circumstances did much to keep up the spirits of both the wounded whom he served and the men fighting in that vicinity.

- First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 47th Infantry, 4th Division.
Accompanying his battalion in the attack on Sergy, he advanced for more than a mile under heavy shellfire, and as soon as the southern half of the town had been taken he established his dressing station, maintaining it during the 3 days of fighting under constant and severe bombardment. When his battalion went into action at St. Thibaut this faithful officer again displayed heroic devotion to duty by working in his dressing station under the most trying conditions for 6 days while the town was bombarded with gas and high-explosive shells.

- Corporal, Company A, 9th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.
Although wounded in the shoulder by a shell fragment on the morning of July 23, he continued to care for the wounded of his company. When sent to the rear for treatment, he refused to be evacuated but returned to his company. This exertion caused his collapse.
- Sergeant, Company B, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
With his patrol leader he cut and crawled through 12 strands of wire in front of an enemy listening post, and with coolness and nerve killed 1 of the sentinels who was firing at the patrol leader.
- Corporal, Company K, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.
While his company, with 2 battalions of the 308th Infantry, were surrounded by the enemy in the Forest of Argonne, Corporal Murphy rushed through a severe machine-gun and shellfire for a distance of 75 yards and carried a severely wounded comrade to a place of safety.
- Major, 102d Machine Gun Battalion, 26th Division.
Major Murphy led a small daylight patrol to reconnoiter the enemy's outpost line. Encountering machine-gun fire, he sheltered his patrol and alone went forward in the face of continuous fire to reconnoiter the town of Epieds. Assuring himself of the strength of the enemy, he returned over the same route, reporting to his brigade headquarters information of the greatest value.
- First lieutenant, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.
Lieutenant Murphy and 4 soldiers flanked a machine-gun nest of 3 guns, only to be fired on directly at 30 yards. Charging the guns, they met hand-to-hand resistance, but repulsed the enemy, capturing the guns. Lieutenant Murphy was wounded twice, and 3 of his men were killed.
- Private, first class, Battery F, 148th Field Artillery.
Private Murphy displayed a remarkable example of heroism by carrying 2 wounded men from the gun pit after being seriously wounded himself, when a German shell exploded within a few feet of the picce which was being loaded, setting fire to several boxes of powder and to the camouflage covering of the pit. After carrying the wounded men to safety, he returned to the pit, closed the breach of the piece, verified its laying, and fired it, preventing what probably would have been a very serious explosion. He was quickly carried to the aid station, where it was found that he had suffered serious burns from the terrific heat, besides being wounded in several places by shell fragments.
- Corporal, Company C, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
Corporal Murphy exposed himself to heavy machine-gun and rifle fire to rescue a wounded man who lay in front of our lines. By crawling from shell hole to shell hole he was able to accomplish the rescue in spite of the heavy enemy fire.
- Private, Company B, 105th Infantry, 27th Division.
During the operations against the Hindenburg line he left shelter, went forward under heavy shell and machine-gun fire, and succeeded in rescuing a wounded soldier, thereby exhibiting great bravery and gallantry. In performing this act he was wounded.
- Sergeant, Battery A, 150th Field Artillery, 42d Division.
When the powder dump near his gun was blown up by enemy fire and the fuse boxes were on fire, Sergeant Murphy, regardless of personal danger from an explosion, went into the fire, extinguishing it. He thereby saved his gun from becoming unserviceable and kept it in action.
- Sergeant, Company I, 64th Infantry, 7th Division.
Sergeant Murphy went forward to the aid of a wounded comrade who was lying about 125 feet in front of the enemy's firing line. Under direct fire of rifles, machine guns, and artillery he applied first aid and took the man back into our trenches to a place of safety.
- Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
As a company runner he repeatedly crossed open ground swept by rifle and machine-gun fire. He volunteered to carry messages out of turn, and though longer and safer routes were often available, he chose the shortest, exposing himself continually to expedite the delivery of important messages. He displayed equal bravery in subsequent operations. When his platoon leader was mortally wounded he organized a carrying party to take the officer back to the dressing station through heavy shellfire.
- Private, Company H, 115th Infantry, 20th Division.
In the Bois Conservoye, east of the Meuse River, when his platoon was stopped he voluntarily advanced in the face of direct machine-gun fire and was killed. His gallant conduct was a great inspiration to his comrades, who, following his example, captured the machine-gun nest, approximately 100 prisoners, and several machine guns.

- First lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He displayed conspicuous bravery and efficiency during the advance upon Bouresches, France, on the night of June 6, 1918. Having been shot through both arms by machine-gun fire and being no longer able to advance, he refused assistance and walked to the rear alone.
- First lieutenant, 3d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division.
Throughout the 5 days of battle, near Soissons, France, July 18-22, 1918, his conduct was marked by exceptional initiative and bravery. He organized Infantry and machine-gun units and voluntarily led them in successful attacks against enemy machine-gun nests.
- Private, Company B, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
While on duty as a runner, he repeatedly crossed a field swept by heavy enemy machine-gun and artillery fire. Although wounded by enemy fire he continued on his hazardous duty. Discovering 5 severely wounded men lying exposed to terrific fire he bravely made his way to them, dragged 2 of the men to safety and assisted others in rescuing the 3 remaining men. He was again wounded while so engaged and was carried from the field. The bravery and devotion to duty displayed by Private Murray greatly strengthened the morale of the men of his battalion.
- First lieutenant, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Lieutenant Murray led his platoon in flank attack against a superior attacking force of the enemy. His fearlessness when exposed to great danger sustained the morale of his men. He continued in this attack until all but 3 of his men were killed or wounded. His conduct was an important contributing item to holding of the position against the repeated onslaughts of the enemy.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. P. J. Murray.
- First lieutenant, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Lieutenant Murray alone attacked an enemy observation post held by 10 of the enemy. He later organized a detachment of scattered men and filled a gap in our lines.
- Corporal, Headquarters Company, 6th Field Artillery, 1st Division.
Corporal Murray voluntarily went forward and made his way to the enemy front lines to locate hostile artillery firing at short range on our batteries.
While on this mission he rescued a wounded comrade and carried him to safety.
- First lieutenant, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
Lieutenant Murrian, acting as regimental intelligence officer, went out with another officer and 9 soldiers to establish an advance outpost. Near the front line they were caught in a German barrage; both officers were wounded, 2 soldiers killed and 4 wounded. As soon as he regained consciousness, he gave first aid to the other wounded, and then proceeded with a sergeant to establish the advance post and communication by telephone with the regimental post of command.
- Sergeant, Company B, 7th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.
While commanding a machine gun in a building which had been struck 3 times, he remained at his post, though told he might leave, because he had a better field of fire from this building than could be obtained elsewhere.
- Private, Company K, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
Private Mutic was a member of a patrol sent out to silence machine-gun nests which were holding up the battalion's advance. When the officer leading the patrol fell, mortally wounded, he attempted to go to the officer's assistance, despite heavy fire from machine guns only 100 yards away, and was himself killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to cousin, Mrs. Stella Walker.
- First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
At Vaux, July 1, 1918, established under heavy shell fire an advance dressing station for the treatment and evacuation of men wounded in the first waves of the assault.
- Sergeant, Company D, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.
During the operations of Oct. 4 to 11, 1918, Sergeant Myers carried messages through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire. During the operations of Nov. 5 to 7, 1918, he was in command of the platoon which maintained liaison between the First and Second Brigades. While performing this duty he single-handedly captured 2 enemy prisoners.
- Private, 82d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Exposing himself to enemy fire, Private Myers, with another soldier, courageously advanced ahead of their platoon and captured 5 machine guns and 14 prisoners.

- Corporal, Company H, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.
He left shelter, went forward under intense machine-gun fire, and carried a wounded officer to a place of safety. In accomplishing this mission he was severely wounded.
- Sergeant, Company L, 142d Infantry, 36th Division.
Sergeant Nail, in charge of a patrol, successfully flanked a machine-gun nest of several guns which was holding up the advance of his company and captured four German officers and 108 men. The success of the assault was largely due to the energy and good judgment of Sergeant Nail.
- Private, medical detachment, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
He displayed unusual courage and devotion to duty by remaining with the first wave of the attack during the 3 days of severe fighting and continuing under constant and heavy fire to give first aid to the wounded and assisting in the rescue of injured men.
- Major, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
While making an inspection of the 2 leading battalions of the regiment on the night of July 22, 1918, Major Nalle entered La Tuilerie Farm and found it occupied. As his party was leaving the farm persons were heard approaching, and, fearing that his men might fire upon friendly troops, he stepped from behind the wall and challenged the party. He was immediately fired upon and killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Gladys F. Nalle.
- Sergeant, Company F, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
Leaving his place of safety, he made his way across an open field exposed to machine-gun fire and assisted in the rescue of 3 wounded comrades.
- Sergeant, Company II, 115th Infantry, 30th Division.
When he and 2 soldiers, separated from the rest of the company, were fired upon from 3 directions he attacked and demolished a machine-gun nest by himself and then reduced a second hostile position. Though wounded and slightly gassed, he refused to be evacuated and continued the advance.
- Private, first class, Headquarters Company, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
He displayed remarkable coolness and courage under violent bombardment when he voluntarily repaired telephone lines and rendered great assistance in maintaining communication. Although wounded, he continued his work until ordered evacuated by his commanding officer.
- Private, Company K, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
While his company was attacked by greatly superior numbers of the enemy Private Nash continued to operate his automatic rifle, even after having been wounded 3 times in the chest. After the attacking force had been driven off he refused the use of a litter in favor of a comrade whom he thought more seriously wounded than himself.
- Private, Company C, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
The squad of which Private Nation was a member was directed to attack an enemy machine-gun position. During the attack all the other members of the squad were killed or wounded. He alone rushed the position, captured the gun, and killed 4 of the crew.
- Private, sanitary detachment, 112th Infantry, 28th Division.
While mess was being served a shell exploded, killing 9 men and wounding 20. Private Naughton, although severely wounded in the chest with shell splinters, 1 leg blown nearly off, and bleeding badly, refused help until the others had been attended to. Skilled in first aid, he instructed others how to adjust a tourniquet and rendered other assistance to the wounded, finally permitting his own wounds, which subsequently caused his death, to be attended after all others were cared for.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Timothy Naughton.
- Corporal, Company A, 1st Gas Regiment.
Voluntarily leaving shelter, Corporal Nay and another soldier made their way, through terrific enemy barrage of artillery and machine-gun fire, to the aid of wounded comrades, carrying them to first-aid stations and administering treatment.
- Sergeant, first class, Company A, 1st Gas Regiment.
Voluntarily leaving shelter, Sergeant Neal and another soldier made their way through a terrific enemy barrage of artillery and machine-gun fire to the aid of wounded comrades, carrying them to first-aid stations and administering treatment.

They flew over the enemy lines at an altitude of only 400 meters, firing on and disconcerting the enemy, and thereby giving courage and confidence to the American forces. Despite heavy fire from 15 anti-aircraft machine guns and several batteries of anti-aircraft artillery they performed their work efficiently. Their airplane was struck by a number of machine-gun bullets, 1 of which cut the rudder and elevator control wires and caused the rudder to jam. The broken control wire was held and operated by Lieutenant Neel, under direction of Lieutenant Llewellyn. - Private, Company C, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.
Having heard that 2 wounded comrades were lying in advance of the line immediately north of Fismette, Private Newlin and 2 other members of his company volunteered to go through machine-gun and rifle fire to bring them in. In their first attempt all were wounded and driven back, but in spite of their injuries they advanced a second time and reached the wounded men. Their courageous effort, however, was unfortunately in vain, as their comrades had been killed.

- Corporal, Company II, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
With another soldier he attacked and destroyed 2 enemy machine-gun posts 200 yards in advance of our lines. While the other soldier stood guard at the entrance of a dugout, he entered it and brought out 75 German soldiers and 3 officers, who were taken back to our lines as prisoners.
- Sergeant, Company C, 345th Battalion, Tank Corps.
While making an attack with 4 other tanks, Sergeant Nichols's tank was struck by an enemy shell, which put it out of action. He continued to fire on a machine-gun nest until it was apparently destroyed, when he, with his driver, dismounted and started to the nest, wherefrom they were fired on by the German gunners. They killed the 2 gunners and disabled the guns, and then drove the gunners from another gun. Under the protection of another tank, they started to our own lines, 1,500 meters away. On the way back they encountered 2 Germans with antitank rifles and captured the rifles. Sergeant Nichols and his driver were under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire throughout the operation.
- Sergeant, first class, 7th Balloon Company, Balloon Service, 1st Army.
On Aug. 11 Sergeant Nicholls volunteered and ascended for the purpose of making an observation. He continued with his work until the balloon was set on fire by attacking enemy planes. On Oct. 1 he remained on duty until his balloon was fired by incendiary bullets, and again on Oct. 9, while on duty with another observer, he remained with his balloon under attack until it was set on fire by enemy planes and he then refused to jump until his companion had escaped.
- Brigadier general, 157th Infantry Brigade, 79th Division.
He established and maintained his brigade post of command on an exposed elevation near the Bois-de-Beuge, in order that he might effectively direct the attack of his brigade upon the Madeleine Farm and its surrounding woods. Realizing the importance of increased artillery support, he personally visited the division post of command behind Montfaucon to seek such support. In his absence the brigade post of command open to enemy observation was swept by a concentration of enemy machine-gun fire and artillery fire. In the face of this terrific fire General Nicholson, with great coolness and with complete disregard for his own safety, rode forward on horseback to his brigade post of command to issue orders for the renewed attack upon the Madeleine Farm, supervising the formation for attack, and by his brave and gallant example inspired the men of his command with renewed courage and determination, which enabled them to reach their objective and hold it against repeated enemy counterattacks.
- Sergeant, Company D, 2d Engineers, 2d Division.
Advancing ahead of the Infantry, he made several reconnaissances of the town of St. Etienne-a-Arnes, France; and, in spite of the danger, exposed to machine-gun and artillery fire of our own and enemy guns, he procured and returned with valuable information.
- Sergeant, Company D, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
Sergeant Nickerson, Corp. M. J. O'Connell, and Pvt. Thomas Ryan volunteered to cross an open field in front of their company, in order to ascertain the location of enemy machine guns. While engaged in this courageous enterprise they were shot and killed. The heroic self-sacrifice of these 3 men saved the lives of many of their comrades who would have been killed had the company attempted to make the advance as a whole.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Horace E. Nickerson.
- Sergeant, Company B, 101st Field Signal Battalion, 26th Division.
At a time when the telephone lines were badly needed he remained without shelter for several hours testing out the lines until a shell burst in his vicinity, wounding him. He died from the effects of the wound in an few hours.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Elizabeth M. Nickles.
- Private, first class, Company B, Replacement Battalion, American Expeditionary Forces, Siberia.
For extraordinary heroism in action at Vladivostok, Siberia, Nov. 17 and 18, 1919. In answer to a call to save women and children who had been unavoidably entrapped in the railroad station by the fire from contending forces of Russian Government and insurgent troops, he boldly entered the zone of fire and rushed to the station which was being fired upon from 3 sides by machine guns, rifles, and field pieces, and assisted in bringing back through the fire-swept zone a number of women noncombatants.
- First lieutenant, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
After being severely wounded, Lieutenant Nicol directed the orderly retirement of his company and organized it under heavy fire of artillery and machine guns. At great personal risk he made several trips forward to bring in wounded men. Throughout the entire action he fearlessly exposed himself to fire in order to encourage and cheer his men. His energetic and faithful work furnished an example of calmness and courage to the men under his command.
- Sergeant, Company A, 111th Machine Gun Battalion, 29th Division.
Sergeant Nicol displayed conspicuous courage and leadership in keeping the guns of his section in action under heavy shell fire, covering the advance of the Infantry. His section was caught in a hostile barrage, by which 2 of his men were killed and 5 wounded. Sergeant Nicol led the rest of the section to shelter and then returned under shell fire and rescued the wounded and dead bodies.

 Leading his squad forward to attack a hostile raiding party composed of 300 storm troops. Although wounded, he maintained his position under the heaviest bombardment and refused to leave his post until the enemy was repulsed.
- Corporal, Company F, 103d Infantry,

 Leading his squad forward to attack an almost impregnable machine-gun nest, he continued to press on when only 2 of his squad remained until he himself fell mortally wounded.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal

- First lieutenant, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.
 While leading his platoon across an open space in front of a wood he was confronted by a sudden and terrific fire from German machine guns, which killed several of his men. Wishing to make a flank attack, and finding it difficult to pass the orders along, he rose up and started to the front wave of his platoon to give the necessary orders, but was killed before he could get the flank attack started.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Jules Niles.
- Sergeant, Company F, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
 During the drive across the St.
 Mihiel salient, he led a group of 25 men through a severe machine-gun fire and into the woods occupied by the enemy. There he charged a machine-gun nest single handed and captured the gun. The gun crew attempted to escape by entering a near-by dugout, but Sergeant Nimmo followed them into the dugout alone and captured the entire crew.
- First sergeant, Company G, 118th
 Infantry, 30th Division.
 After all his company officers had been wounded, Sergeant Nims, though himself wounded in the leg by shell fire, assumed command, and led his company with remarkable dash through heavy machine-gun fire. Using a stick as a crutch, he continued forward until the objective was reached and the position consolidated, when he consented to go to the rear for treatment.
- First lieutenant, Field Artillery, attached to 3d Balloon Squadron, Air Service.
 On August 28, Lieutenant Nixon was locating active enemy batteries from his balloon and was attacked several times by enemy planes, but refused to descend until one had set fire to the balloon. On Sept. 28, while he was on a recon mission, 5 enemy planes fired at him. He remained in the basket until the balloon was a mass of flames, and 1 of the enemy aviators followed him to the ground, firing at him.
 Despite his narrow escape he immediately reascended.
- Captain, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
 He fearlessly led a counterattack through an intense barrage, inspiring his men to success by his personal example.
- Private, sanitary detachment, 111th
 Infantry, 28th Division.
 Seeing 5 of our men lying wounded on the enemy side of the street in the town of Fismette, Private Nixon voluntarily attempted the rescue of them, despite the fact that the enemy was pouring a deluge of machine-gun fire on the location. He organized a counterattacking force and repeatedly exposed himself in attacking the nest, finally succeeding in his mission of rescuing the wounded.
- First lieutenant, 6th Regiment,
 U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
 He was conspicuous for his judgment and personal courage in handling his company in attacks against superior numbers in strongly fortified machine-gun positions. His fortitude and initiative enabled his command each time to achieve success.
- First lieutenant, 128th Infantry,
 32d Division.
 He voluntarily exposed himself to heavy shell fire in placing his men under cover during a heavy bombardment. While assisting a wounded soldier he was struck by a shell and killed.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John H. Noble.
- Corporal, Company D, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
 After 4 members of his automatic-rifle squad had become casualties in an effort to get their automatic rifle into action against a machine-gun nest, Corporal Noble fearlessly exposed himself, set up the rifle, and silenced the machine gun just as another enemy machine gun on the flank opened fire and killed him.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Janie Berry.
- First lieutenant, 364th Infantry,
 91st Division.
 Lieutenant Noble gallantly led his men under heavy fire in an attack through barbedwire entanglements on the enemy positions before Bois-de-Cheppy. His conduct had a marked moral effect upon his men and he continued leading the attack until killed by enemy fire.

- First lieutenant, 168th Infantry, 42d Division.
He gave proof of unhesitating devotion and energy during the offensive operations of Sergy, brilliantly leading his platoon to the assault in disregard of all danger. While charged with the support and protection of a reconnaissance in no man's land he gave the best example of calmness, decision, and courage under intense machine-gun fire. Wounded in this action, he refused to be evacuated and remained in command of his platoon until ordered off the field by his major.
- Second lieutenant, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
Discovering a German machine-gun nest which was inflicting severe damage upon his battalion, he led 12 men to the right flank of the nest and charged it up a steep hill under fire from other guns. He and his men wiped out this center of resistance and made possible the advance of his company. Although wounded himself, he personally took command of large numbers of men of the company, after his captain and other platoon commanders had been killed or wounded, and advanced with them to the company's objective and held it.
- Brigadier general, 55th Infantry Brigade, 28th Division.
While the enemy was preparing a counterattack, which they preceded by a terrific barrage, General Nolan made his way into the town of Apremont and personally directed the movements of his tanks under a most harassing fire of enemy machine guns, rifles, and artillery. His indomitable courage and coolness so inspired his forces that about 400 of our troops repulsed an enemy attack of two German regiments.
- Pharmacist's mate, third class, U. S. Navy, attached to 18th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
During the operations at Blanc Mont Ridge he repeatedly went through intense machine-gun and shellfire to administer first aid to officers and soldiers who were wounded, and lying in exposed positions.
- Hospital apprentice, first class, U. S. Navy, attached to 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He rendered exceptional assistance to his wounded comrades by continually giving first aid to them under machine-gun fire.
- Private, Company B, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
With three other soldiers he charged and captured a battery of three .77 field pieces which, protected by machine guns, were firing point blank on the position held by his company. This deed enabled his company to continue the advance.
- Private, Battery E, 107th Field Artillery, 28th Division.
Although severely burned by gas, he refused to be evacuated, voluntarily remaining on duty for 2 days, repairing telephone connections day and night over shell-swept areas from the battery position to the observation post. He worked faithfully, maintaining adequate telephone service, until ordered to the rear.
- Corporal, Company C, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
Corporal Norris, an automatic rifleman, crept about 600 yards ahead of the line held by our troops and after locating 2 enemy machine guns, he opened fire and succeeded in destroying 1 of the enemy guns and forcing 2 of the enemy to surrender. He then turned the captured gun on the enemy to such effect that his company was able to advance with slight loss.
- Major, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
During the attack on the Cote-de-Chatillon, Major Norris personally led his battalion through the intense artillery and machine-gun fire. Although the attack led through a dense forest, he maneuvered his battalion with such success that liaison was maintained at all times between the units of his command and with the units on the right and left flank, and a successful attack made upon a position considered almost impregnable. He was wounded during this attack.
- Second lieutenant, observer, 11th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Deeming it impossible to catch their own formation, Lieutenant Norris, with Lieut. William Waring, pilot, attached themselves to a formation from the 20th Squadron and engaged in a 35-minute fight with 30 enemy aircraft. Five of the 20th Squadron were lost and the observer of 1 of the remaining planes seriously wounded. The wounded man had fallen in a position which had made the control of the machine difficult. Lieutenant Norris immediately motioned for his pilot to take a position between the enemy formation and the crippled companion in order to protect it, and continued to fight off the enemy planes until our lines were crossed.
- Corporal, Company G, 364th Infantry, 91st Division.
He voluntarily preceded his company in searching woods for the purpose of locating enemy snipers, who were causing numerous casualties. He also made numerous trips under artillery and machine-gun fire to maintain liaison with adjacent units. When his company was making its first advance under heavy shellfire, this soldier took the place of a rifle sergeant's section and kept this unit intact during the advance.

- Corporal, Company C, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
Even after being warned of the danger of attempting to get through the murderous fire and after he had seen all the other battalion runners killed or wounded on the same mission, Corporal O'Kelly willingly volunteered and started with a message to regimental headquarters. When he had gone but a short distance he managed to reach his destination, after which he was taken to a hospital.
- Sergeant, Company K, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.
Sergeant Olanson, with his company commander, outflanked a machine-gun nest which was holding up their advance, shot 1 German noncommissioned officer who tried to escape, and captured 2 prisoners, the other occupants fleeing. The reduction of this machine-gun nest made it possible for the flank of the battalion to advance.
- Sergeant, Company I, 139th Infantry, 35th Division.
Sergeant Oldfield was in charge of his platoon when it was subjected to heavy enemy machine-gun fire, causing numerous casualties. By his word and example he held his men in line as a unit until nightfall, when they entrenched.
Next day when the tanks appeared he led the charge upon the machine guns which were holding up the advance. Inspired by his gallantry, his men went forward and cleared out the guns and assisted in the capture of Char-pentry, with many prisoners.
- Sergeant, 18th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
After all the runners had been wounded, Sergeant Olds volunteered to act as runner and made several trips through machine-gun and artillery fire.
- Private, first class, Company H, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
Private (First Class) Oldynski advanced ahead of his squad through heavy machine-gun fire and engaged in a hand-to-hand fight with an enemy sergeant, whom he killed. He killed 2 others of the enemy before the other members of his squad arrived and assisted in the capture of remaining enemy soldiers with their guns.
- Corporal, Battery F, 124th Field Artillery, 33d Division.
He left shelter and volunteered as a stretcher bearer, making frequent trips to and from gun positions under heavy fire until he was killed by an enemy shell.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Robert O'Leary.
- Corporal, Company B, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
Assisting his platoon commander and one other comrade, Corporal Olejnik went forward, attacking and capturing an enemy machine gun and 8 prisoners.
- Sergeant, Company A, 7th Engineers, 5th Division.
By his energy, initiative, and courage he located several machine-gun nests and captured 9 prisoners and an anti-tank gun when sent out with 3 other soldiers to locate the enemy positions.
- Sergeant, Company H, 23th Infantry, 1st Division.
After having been severely wounded by shrapnel, he refused to leave the lines, realizing the urgent need of men. After being relieved, he walked to the dressing station, despite his weakness from loss of blood and his painful suffering from the wound.
- Private, Company E, 125 Infantry, 32d Division.
Many times daily during this advance Private Ollrich displayed an entire disregard of personal danger in the carrying of messages through enemy barrages. Later, in the fighting near Fismes, when it became necessary to send an important message to the commanding officer of the battalion, although Private Ollrich had been on constant duty night and day for 4 days, he attempted to deliver the message but was killed while crossing a shell-swept zone.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Henry Ollrich.
- Sergeant, Company F, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
He was a member of a working party on the night of Feb. 23, 1918, well out in front of the advance post. His party encountered a violent barrage of the enemy which protected enemy assault troops. He helped to fight off the German troops, and walked back and forth twice under the enemy's and our own barrage to collect his men. When he heard that his lieutenant was in trouble, he walked back again to his rescue, where the barrage had at first overtaken him.
- Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 364th Infantry, 91st Division.
With 2 other soldiers, Sergeant Olsen volunteered and went 300 yards beyond our outpost lines, through heavy shell fire, to bring in a wounded private of his regiment. The mission was promptly and successfully accomplished.

- Corporal, Company K, 327th Infantry, 82d Division.
 Assisted by another soldier, Corporal Olsen crawled far in advance of our lines under terrific machine-gun and shell fire and brought back a severely wounded comrade.
- Private, 77th Company, 6th Machine Gun Battalion, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
 While his platoon was following the advance of an Infantry platoon which had become separated, Private Olsen was seriously wounded in the foot by machine-gun fire. At the edge of heavy brushwood a company of German Infantry was encountered, and Private Olsen, who had been forced to fall some distance behind rushed forward as best he could and set up his tripod, acting as loader until the enemy was repulsed.
- Private Company I, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
 He was a squad leader in the second platoon. After reaching his objective he displayed extraordinary qualities of leadership in organizing scattering squads of Company I and placing them in advantageous positions in spite of severe machine-gun fire and artillery bombardment. His disregard of danger and fine leadership were an inspiration to his comrades.
- Private, first class, Company L, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
 He displayed conspicuous bravery by going from the front line to an advanced post and rescuing, unaided, a wounded comrade in the face of heavy machine-gun fire.
- Private, first class, Company A, 13th Machine Gun Battalion, 5th Division.
 Accompanying another soldier, Private Olson left shelter and went forward 100 meters over territory swept by shells and machine-gun fire, and carried a wounded man to safety.
- Captain, Medical Corps, attached to 7th Sussex Regiment, British Expeditionary Forces.
 Under intense enemy machine-gun and rifle fire he went to the rescue of wounded British soldiers, dressed their wounds, and assisted in carrying them to places of comparative safety. While thus engaged one of the stretcher bearers in the rescue party was killed and another wounded. These men Captain O'Malley also assisted in carrying to the British dressing station.
- Private, Company L, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
 When machine-gun and rifle fire was so heavy that his company commander would not order a runner out, Private O'Neal volunteered and carried messages from the regimental post of command to his company, making numerous trips under heavy machine-gun and shell fire during the day and night.
- Sergeant, Company C, 8th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.
 Having been seriously wounded during an attack, Sergeant O'Neal refused to leave the field until he had led his men to cover and reestablished his guns for action, inspiring the other members of his platoon by his courage and fortitude.
- Captain, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
 When the advance of his battalion was held up for nearly 2 hours, Lieutenant O'Neill, with 4 other soldiers, made an attack on the enemy, and although subjected to direct fire, he succeeded in silencing 2 of their machine guns and enabling his battalion to proceed farther.
- Private, 110th Ambulance Company, 103d Sanitary Train, 28th Division.
 Under heavy shell and machine-gun fire, he voluntarily made 5 trips to ascertain the condition of a bridge over the Vesle River, to make sure it was safe for the passage of ambulances. Later, when the bridge became impassable for vehicles, he crossed the bridge on foot and brought back food and medical supplies.
- Second lieutenant, 147th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
 Lieutenant O'Neill and four other pilots attacked 12 enemy battle planes. In a violent battle within the enemy's lines they brought down 3 German planes, 1 of which was credited to Lieutenant O'Neill.
 Oak-leaf clusters (2).
 A bronze oak-leaf cluster is awarded to Lieutenant O'Neill for the following act of extraordinary heroism in action: On July 5, 1918, he led 3 other pilots in battle against 8 German pursuit planes near Chateau-Thierry, France. He attacked the leader, opening fire at about 150 yards and closing up to 30 yards range. After a quick and decisive fight the enemy aircraft fell in flames. He then turned on 3 other machines that were attacking him from the rear and brought 1 of them down. The other 5 enemy planes were driven away.
 A bronze oak-leaf cluster is also awarded to Lieutenant O'Neill for the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Fresnes, France, July 24, 1918: Lieutenant O'Neill, with 4 other pilots, engaged 12 enemy planes discovered hiding in the sun. Leading the way to an advantageous position by a series of the bold and skillful maneuvers, Lieutenant O'Neill shot down the leader of the hostile formation. The other German planes then closed in on him, but he climbed to a position of vantage above them and returned to the fight and drove down another plane. In this encounter he not only defeated his opponents in spite of overwhelming odds against him but also enabled the reconnaissance plane to carry on its work unmolested.

- First lieutenant, pilot, 12th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Lieutenant Orr, flying with Lieut. Phil A. Henderson, Infantry, observer, on an unprotected reconnaissance mission, encountered a patrol of 8 enemy pursuit planes near the American balloon line. The patrol was sighted just as one of them dived on the balloon with the intention of destroying it. Without hesitation, Lieutenant Orr attacked this plane and followed it to within 50 meters, firing his single front gun against the double guns with which the German plane was equipped. In the meantime Lieutenant Henderson engaged the other 8 planes, which attacked from the rear. After a violent combat, all of the enemy planes were driven off. On Sept. 14, 1918, Lieutenant Orr was accidentally killed.

All of these men were attached to the 88th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
- For extraordinary heroism in action near Fismes, France, Aug. 11, 1918. Under the protection of 3 pursuit planes, each carrying a pilot and an observer, Lieutenants Bernheimer and Jordan, in charge of a photo plane, carried out successfully a hazardous photographic mission over the enemy's lines to the River Aisne. The 4 American ships were attacked by 12 enemy battle planes. Lieutenant Bernheimer, by coolly and skillfully maneuvering his ship, and Lieutenant Jordan, by accurate operation of his machine gun, in spite of wounds in the shoulder and leg, aided materially in the victory which came to the American ships, and returned safely with 36 valuable photographs. The pursuit plane operated by Lieutenants Hitchcock and Burns was disabled while these 2 officers were fighting effectively. Lieutenant Burns was mortally wounded and his body jammed the controls. After a headlong fall of 2,500 meters, Lieutenant Hitchcock succeeded in regaining control of this plane and piloted it back to his airdrome. Lieutenants McClendon and Plummer were shot down and killed after a vigorous combat with 5 of the enemy's planes. Lieutenants Babcock and Palmer, by gallant and skillful fighting, aided in driving off the German planes and were materially responsible for the successful execution of the photographic mission.

Unable to locate the line at the usual altitude maintained at such a time, he flew down to the dangerous altitude of 50 meters, secured the important information sought and discovered our lines held up by a strongly held nest of enemy machine guns. Noting the exact location of the nest upon his map he flew back to division headquarters and reported the exact location of our lines, as well as that of the enemy machine-gun nest. With his plane riddled by enemy bullets, one control shot away, he returned to the lines, discovered the enemy nests had not been destroyed and that they were inflicting heavy casualties upon our troops. In the face of concentrated enemy fire and attacked by 4 enemy planes he went down, his plane barely skimming the tree tops, and deliberately fired over 400 rounds into the enemy nests, thus causing the enemy gunners to abandon their guns and positions and enabling the troops of his division to resume their advance. Again gaining altitude he discovered and destroyed by his fire an enemy signal station, signaling unmolested, 2 kilometers north of the lines. This act was performed at an altitude of 50 meters amid a storm of protection fire from enemy anti-aircraft guns. |

Several times he was an inspiring figure to his men under a heavy artillery barrage and concentration of machine-gun fire.A bronze oak leaf is also awarded to Colonel Parker for the following act of extraordinary heroism: On July 25, 1918, on the road through La Fere Wood, between Beuvardes and Le Charmel, France, a battalion just coming into the line was halted, awaiting orders. Subjected suddenly to an intense artillery concentration, the men, who had only such cover as was afforded by the shallow ditches along the road, were thrown into some confusion. At that moment Colonel Parker came down the road on horseback. Immediately appreciating the situation, he twice rode down the line and back again at a slow walk, stopping to talk with the men; and thus by his fearless personal exposure to and disregard of danger he promptly steadied the troops and prevented probable disorder at an important juncture.A bronze oak leaf is also awarded to Colonel Parker for extraordinary heroism in action near Gesnes, France, Sept. 29, 1918. During the attack on the village of Gesnes he displayed great gallantry and fearlessness in leading and directing his front line with utter disregard for personal safety and urged his men forward by his personal example, all under heavy machine-gun, high-explosive gas-shell, and shrapnel fire. He was abreast of his front line until he fell, twice wounded, but thereafter remained in active command for a period of five hours, when he was relieved by the lieutenant colonel of his regiment. |

Leading the attack, Major Parkin received 4 wounds from enemy machine-gun fire, but declined to be evacuated, remaining with his command in the position he had captured, temporarily assigning active command of his battalion to his senior captain. Later, learning that this officer had been killed, Major Parkin, despite intense suffering from his wounds, again assumed active command, and under a terrific enemy concentration of artillery and machine-gun fire, defended the position with great bravery and gallantry against counterattacks by vastly superior numbers of the enemy forces. His undaunted courage greatly inspired the men of his command, raising their morale to a great pitch. |

- Second lieutenant, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
While in charge of an ammunition-carrying party near Soissons, France, July 19, 1918, he showed the highest degree of courage in taking ammunition to the front lines through artillery and machine-gun fire, and was killed while engaged in this duty.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, James M. Payne.
- Sergeant, Company A, 372d Infantry, 93d Division.
Having found a machine gun hidden in a brush which was causing serious casualties to his company, he crept up, killed the gunners with his rifle, and captured the gun.
- First lieutenant, observer, 26th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Starting on a very important daylight bombing mission with 5 other planes, as observer he went on alone when the other 5 planes were forced to turn back. On crossing the German line, he was attacked by 3 enemy planes. Using his guns to keep the enemy at bay, he went on, reached his objective, and dropped his bombs on the railroad junction, cutting the line. On the way back 4 more planes joined in the attack, but, keeping them at bay with his guns, he reached the allied lines.
- Sergeant, Company D, 3d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division.
During a heavy bombardment he located a position in which his platoon would be less exposed to the intense shelling, and, returning, he collected his men and led them to this new location without a casualty. In the course of this exploit he was severely wounded, but directed his platoon to the place of protection after falling from exhaustion. He died on his way to the hospital.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, J. J. Payne.
- Sergeant, Company C, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
During the attack made by the company on the village of Cierges, Sergeant Payson was mortally wounded in the head by a machine-gun bullet. He succeeded in keeping on his feet, however, and with the attacking wave, encouraging them, and by his strong will power he instilled in them all the spirit of fearlessness.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Minnie Timberman.
- Second lieutenant, 306th Machine Gun Battalion, 77th Division.
While commanding a detachment of his battalion operating with a battalion of the 308th Infantry, Lieutenant Peabody, although badly wounded, continued to personally direct the fire and operation of his machine guns, which were continuously meeting and shattering the repeated hostile attacks and defending the entire Infantry detachment in its exposed and precarious position. While crawling in a severely wounded condition to a machine gun in a most exposed position, he was killed by enemy machine-gun fire.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Alexander M. Peabody.
- Sergeant, Company K, 141st Infantry, 36th Division.
All the officers of his company being killed, he took command and led the company into action, capturing 62 German prisoners who were occupying and directing a fire against our troops from 6 machine-gun nests.
- Corporal, Company F, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.
Being the only member of his detachment who knew how to operate an enemy machine gun, he volunteered to go forward in the attack near Fismette, in spite of just having been so badly wounded in his left shoulder that his left arm was partially useless. He participated in the assault and with one arm operated a captured German machine gun against the enemy until he was again wounded.
- Private, Company M, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
While delivering a message, Private Peaden was seriously wounded by a bullet which entered his cheek and passed through his lower right jaw, but he refused to be evacuated, and continued on duty until the following day. Upon reporting to the aid station he was evacuated to the hospital, where the wound was found to be so serious that he was compelled to remain there for several weeks.
- First lieutenant, 2d Infantry Brigade, 1st Division.
During a violent attack from artillery and machine guns at Berzy-le-Sec, France, July 21, 1918, while serving as liaison officer he fearlessly exposed himself, exceeding the demands of duty to assist in reforming units that had been disseminated in battle and directing them to effective positions.
- Private, Company C, 1st Engineers, 1st Division.
When volunteers were called for by his company commander, Private Pearce volunteered and rescued wounded comrades from a barrage. Disregarding danger to himself, he continued the performance of these heroic deeds until killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Joseph G. Pearce.
- Private, Machine Gun Company, 370th Infantry, 93d Division.
While under heavy fire Private Pearson volunteered and, accompanied by another soldier, rescued a wounded comrade from an exposed position, carrying him to the first-aid station.

- First lieutenant, observer, 120th Infantry, 168th Aero Squadron, Air Service. As an observer in a De Havilland-4 plane, he flew an Infantry contact mission over the line of the 7th Division. Because of exceedingly adverse weather conditions, he disregarded the danger of fire from the ground and crossed the lines at 1,000 feet altitude. While thus flying he was wounded in the shoulder by an explosive bullet fired from the ground. Disregarding his wound, he came down to an altitude as low as 500 feet. After securing the desired information, he wrote out his message with great effort and dropped it to the division.

- Captain, 358th Infantry, 90th Division.
As commander of the support company of his battalion, Captain Peters displayed courage and leadership by rushing 2 platoons into position to protect the right flank of the battalion which had suddenly become exposed. Under his personal leadership, in the face of intense machine-gun and shell fire, a number of enemy machine-gun nests were stormed and enemy combat groups dispersed. Serious danger to the advancing line was thereby averted. This gallant officer was killed shortly afterwards in a raid on the enemy. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Nettie Peters.
- Private, Company I, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
When the advance of his platoon was held up by an enemy machine gun, Private Peters, on his own initiative, flanked the position, killed the gunner and captured the rest of the crew, thereby allowing the platoon to advance.
- Private, 140th Ambulance Company, 110th Sanitary Train, 35th Division.
Serving as a litter-bearer, he voluntarily left cover and exposed himself to intense artillery fire to rescue wounded men lying in the open. Mortally wounded, he continued to assist in the rescue of wounded comrades till he fell exhausted. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Helen Petersen.
- Sergeant, medical detachment, 151st Field Artillery, 42d Division.
After being mortally wounded he gave detailed instructions to other wounded soldiers and gave first gas tests in order to save the lives of the men about him. He died the same night.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. J. A. Petersen.
- Corporal, Company II, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
When his platoon was held up by a heavy flanking machine-gun fire, Corporal Peterson advanced alone ahead of the platoon, on his own initiative, and successfully cleaned up the machine-gun nest with hand grenades and captured the machine gun.
- Private, Company B, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.
He sacrificed his life in fearlessly going out in the face of machine-gun fire and attempting to rescue another soldier who had been mortally wounded. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Louis C. Peterson.
- Captain, 94th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Leading a patrol of 3, he encountered 5 enemy planes at an altitude of 3,500 meters and immediately gave battle. Notwithstanding the fact he was attacked from all sides, this officer, by skillful maneuvering, succeeded in shooting down 1 of the enemy planes and dispersing the remaining 4. Oak-leaf cluster.
A bronze oak leaf is awarded to Captain Peterson for extraordinary heroism in action near Thiaucourt, France, on May 15, 1918. While on a patrol alone he encountered 2 enemy planes at an altitude of 52 meters. He promptly attacked, despite the odds, and shot down 1 of the enemy planes in flames. While thus engaged he was attacked from above by the second enemy plane, but by skillful maneuvering he succeeded in shooting it down also.
- Pharmacist's mate, third class, U. S. Navy, attached to 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He was directly responsible for the saving of several lives while obliged to care for the company's wounded alone. On succeeding days he traveled from one side of the company sector to the other, through artillery and machine-gun barrage, hunting and caring for the wounded.
- Private, Company E, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
He displayed exceptional bravery in carrying important messages to the rear through heavy enemy artillery and machine-gun barrages, keeping his commanding officer informed as to the situation at all times. Tireless in his efforts, he was instrumental in the success of the operation. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. Jonas J. Akre.
- Corporal, Company G, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
While leading a scouting party, Corporal Peterson encountered an enemy patrol and displayed exceptional courage and leadership in killing the officer and two soldiers who composed it. He repeatedly volunteered for dangerous patrol work with great bravery and aggressiveness until he was killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Catherine Peterson.
- Sergeant, Company A, 59th Infantry, 4th Division.
Discovering the enemy making a counterattack to the left flank of his platoon Sergeant Peterson immediately organized a combat group of 25 men, and though greatly outnumbered by the Germans he succeeded in routing them, inspiring his men by his disregard of personal danger. He was severely wounded later in the day, but he refused to go to the rear until he had reorganized his platoon an hour and a half later.
- Private, first class, Company D, 114th Machine Gun Battalion, 30th Division.
Severely wounded while operating a machine gun under shell fire, he refused to leave his post until he was removed by his comrades against his protests.

- Sergeant, Company I, 362d Infantry, 91st Division.
 He repeatedly led patrols in successful attacks on enemy machine-gun em-placements, displaying calmness and keen judgment. After being wounded he insisted on remaining in command of his platoon.
- Sergeant, Company B, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
 When the company guarding the flank was on the verge of retreating in disorder, Sergeant Peterson avoided the perilous situation by jumping to the front and holding the badly shaken troops in their positions on the line.
 His quick action during the terrific fire was responsible for the safety of the entire line.
- First Sergeant, Company II, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
 Because of casualties among officers, Sergeant Peterson was placed in command of the second wave, which he led with exceptional bravery and leadership.
 When it became isolated in a fog he crawled forward by himself to ascertain the character of troops which were seen a kilometer to the front, and upon finding that they were hostile immediately established liaison with adjacent units and straightened out his line, after breaking up several enemy machine-gun nests.
- Second Lieutenant, Infantry, attached to 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
 Killed in action at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Fred Peterson.
- Second lieutenant, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
 After being seriously wounded in the assault against strong enemy positions in the Bois-de-la-Reine, Lieutenant Petit stumbled on at the head of his command until compelled to turn over the command to a sergeant on account of his condition. After this he remained in a shell hole under a terrific concentration of machine-gun and artillery fire, encouraging his men as best he could, and aiding to the utmost of his ability by sniping the enemy with the rifle of a soldier wounded more severely than himself.
- Bugler, Company G, 56th Infantry, 7th Division.
 Under heavy and deadly machine-gun fire he carried messages to and from his company. After all other means of communication had been cut off he volunteered and carried many important messages through artillery fire, thus establishing liaison with the rear. He was later wounded while passing through a barrage.
- First lieutenant, pilot, 139th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
 After having become separated from his patrol, Lieutenant Petree encountered 7 enemy planes. He alone attacked this enemy group and continued in combat against these great odds for over 1 hour, when he was killed.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Frank Petree.
- Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
 Sergeant Petriméan led his machine-gun section through heavy machine-gun and artillery fire to an exposed position in order to engage an enemy machine gun which was causing heavy casualties to his battalion. He was killed during the attack. Sergeant Petriméan had previously performed gallant service while keeping his machine-gun section in action during a heavy enemy bombardment at Cantigny, France, May 23, 1918.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Cleanthis Petriméan.
- Corporal, Battery D, 6th Field Artillery, 1st Division.
 When a shell burst near his gun, throwing him across the train of the piece and killing or wounding all of the section but himself and 1 other cannoneer, Corporal Petrovic and the latter succeeded in repairing the piece and continued the rolling barrage until it became impossible to fire the gun again.
 Two days later, under almost identical circumstances, he and one other soldier continued at their post, after the other members of the crew had been wounded, and continued to serve the piece until the completion of the barrage.
- Passed Assistant Surgeon, U. S. Navy, attached to 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
 While he was treating wounded under bombardment of gas and high-explosive shells, he was knocked down and his gas mask torn by a bursting gas shell, but he discarded his gas mask and continued his work. Later, when his dressing station was demolished by another shell, he helped carry a wounded officer through the shellfire to a place of safety.
- Private, Company B, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
 Showing utter disregard of personal danger, he went to the rescue of his wounded platoon leader, who lay in a zone covered by heavy enemy machine-gun fire, being himself mortally wounded in the attempt. Private Petty volunteered to attempt the rescue, which cost him his life, after two of his comrades had been killed and another wounded in similar trials.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to son, Howard Wayne Petty.

- First sergeant, Company L, 326th Infantry, 82d Division.
After he had seen an officer and 13 men of his company fall from the fire of enemy machine guns and snipers, Sergeant Peurifoy advanced alone, and, after crawling about 50 yards in advance of his company, he shot a sniper from a tree and drove off the crews of 2 machine guns located near by. His action permitted the further advance of his company.
- Supply sergeant, Supply Company, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
In response to a call from the attacking battalion for ammunition he drove a combat wagon in broad daylight into the front-line positions near Fere-en-Tardenois, and delivered the ammunition required by his comrades on the front.
- Private, Company K, 327th Infantry, 82d Division.
Assisted by another soldier, Private Pfeil crawled far in advance of our lines under terrific machine-gun and shell fire and brought back a severely wounded comrade.
- Corporal, Company E, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
Corporal Phelan voluntarily left the assaulting wave of his company, and, single handed, captured or killed the entire crew of a concealed machine-gun position, which was delivering a terrific and accurate fire upon his comrades from the right flank. His timely and gallant act drew the fire of the machine gun from his comrades until they were able to find shelter and saved the lives of many of the assaulting wave.
- Corporal, Company M, 328th Infantry, 82d Division.
After fighting for 6 hours Corporal Phelan volunteered to accompany 15 other soldiers and an officer on night patrol of the town of Cornay, which was held by many machine-gun posts. The party worked from 11 o'clock at night till next morning in clearing buildings and dugouts of the enemy, capturing 65 prisoners and 2 machine guns. With 6 others, Corporal Phelan volunteered and entered a dugout, where 23 prisoners were captured. He was wounded while leaving the town, but he refused to go to the aid station until the prisoners had been delivered at brigade headquarters.
- First lieutenant, observer, 5th Balloon Company, Air Service.
While regulating artillery fire from his balloon, Lieutenant Phelps, with another observer, was attacked by 3 enemy planes and forced to jump after his balloon had been set on fire. On 4 other occasions his balloon was sent down in flames, after being attacked by superior numbers of the enemy, but on each occasion he resumed his work just as soon as another balloon could be obtained.
- Corporal, 78th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He advanced alone on 2 machine-gun nests, which he captured, killing several of the crew with his pistol. Two hours later he again went forward with 2 other soldiers, and while attacking another machine-gun nest, he was killed by shrapnel.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Emma Philblad.
- Private, Company A, 4th Machine Gun Battalion, 2d Division.
On July 18, 1918, he twice drove a light truck loaded with ammunition through Vierz and up the road directly in the rear of the position occupied by his company, this road being under heavy shell fire at all times. On the morning of the 19th of July he returned over the same route with rations and ran his truck under machine-gun fire to within 50 yards of the trenches. On the return trip his truck was hit by a shell and destroyed, whereupon he borrowed another truck and returned.
- First lieutenant, 339th Infantry, 85th Division (detachment in north Russia).
With a few men and 2 Lewis guns he held the enemy counterattack for an hour, until reinforcements arrived. He constantly encouraged and inspired his men by the example of heroism he set, refusing all aid when seriously wounded, to avoid weakening his small effective force.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Ann<sup>ne</sup> Kathryn Phillips.
- Private, first class, Company K, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
While his company was waiting orders, after having reached the crest of Hill 212, he voluntarily left his place and went for a message when an approaching runner was seen to fall, too badly wounded to reach the company. This act was done voluntarily and under the direct fire of the enemy's machine guns, as well as the terrific bombardment to which the hill was then subjected.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John Phillips.
- Private, Company K, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
Private Phillips was a member of a patrol sent out to silence machine-gun nests which were holding up the battalion's advance. When the officer leading the patrol fell, mortally wounded, he went to his assistance in the face of heavy fire from machine guns only 100 yards away, remaining in this position until nightfall, though himself seriously wounded.

The incendiary bullets from the enemy's machines set the signal rockets in the observer's cockpit afire. Disregarding the possibility of going down in flames, Lieutenant Phillips maneuvered his plane so that his observer was able to fire on and destroy 1 enemy plane and drive the others away. He then handed his fire extinguisher to Lieutenant Brown, who extinguished the flames. They completed their mission and secured valuable information. |

- Sergeant, Company K, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
When the advance of his company was halted by machine-gun fire Sergeant Piovano crawled to an exposed position and opened fire on the enemy, although a target for the fire of several enemy machine guns. He killed several of the enemy with rifle fire and so disorganized the enemy that his organization was able to advance with slight loss.
- Private, Company E, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.
When his company had suffered heavy casualties and been withdrawn he went out with another soldier in advance of our lines and under machine-gun fire to rescue the wounded. His companion shot down, he continued his work, though constantly exposed to heavy fire, carrying back 2 wounded men and the soldier who had started out with him.
- First lieutenant, 59th Infantry, 4th Division.
Throughout the engagement in the Bois-du-Fays Lieutenant Pirtle led his men with absolute disregard for his personal safety. He walked up and down the lines under intense enemy machine-gun and artillery fire, encouraging his men and consolidating his position. His courageous example contributed greatly to the success of the operation in which his organization was engaged. He continued in action until severely wounded in the knee and was carried from the field.
- Private, Company C, 5th Machine Gun Battalion, 2d Division.
When 3 infantrymen were buried by a shell explosion near Chateau-Thierry June 6, 1918, he fearlessly left shelter in face of heavy shelling and rescued them.
- Private, first class, Company M, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
Being informed that a wounded man was lying in no man's land, Private Pitts immediately volunteered, and, with Sergeant Collins, went to his aid. The intense fire of the enemy necessitated crawling the entire distance. While on the return trip the wounded man was hit by a machine-gun bullet and instantly killed, but these 2 men brought in the dead body, crawling with great difficulty over the shell-torn ground.
- Private, first class, Battery E, 322d Field Artillery, 83d Division.
Though mortally wounded and gassed, he continued his work as telephone operator and linesman, repairing telephone lines and remaining on duty until ordered to be evacuated. His example of heroism and fortitude inspired those working with him.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Albert J. Plassmeyer.
- Captain, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
He repeatedly led his battalion against machine-gun nests, through terrific enemy bombardment, until his objectives were attained. During the process of the attack, when his men were being cut down by hidden fire, he personally located the gun and shot the gunner. His gallant example to his troops was an important factor in the success of the attack.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Andrew Platner.
- Captain, 106th Machine Gun Battalion, 27th Division.
Captain Platt, while moving forward in the attack with machine-gun units, encountered a number of stragglers in a sunken road. He organized these men into a company and led them in attacking waves. Later he personally led a patrol which located and silenced enemy machine guns which were firing from a flank position.
- Corporal, 45th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Killed in action at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.

- First lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Seriously wounded in the leg early in the engagement, he continued to direct the operations not only of his platoon but of another. He charged and drove off the crew of an enemy machine gun, supervised the disposition and digging in of a large part of his company, and yielded command only when exhausted from pain and loss of blood.
- Cook, Battery B, 121st Field Artillery, 32d Division.
When the gun crews of the platoons in the woods were forced to withdraw on account of the intense enemy shelling, a wounded man was left behind. Noticing this, Cook Platten rushed into the woods, despite the continual shelling, and brought the man to safety.
- Private, first class, Company H, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
After having just returned from a hazardous trip through heavy shellfire, he volunteered and carried a message to his company commander. As he was about to complete his mission the company commander was mortally wounded by a shell. All of these men were attached to the 88th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
For extraordinary heroism in action near Fismes, France, August 11, 1918. Under the protection of 3 pursuit planes, each carrying a pilot and an observer, Lieutenants Bernheimer and Jordan, in charge of a photo plane, carried out successfully a hazardous photographic mission over the enemy's lines to the River Alsie. The 4 American ships were attacked by 12 enemy battle planes. Lieutenant Bernheimer, by coolly and skillfully manuevering his ship, and Lieutenant Jordan, by accurate operation of his machine gun, in spite of wounds in the shoulder and leg, aided materially in the victory which came to the American ships, and returned safely with 36 valuable photographs. The pursuit plane operated by Lieutenants Hitchcock and Burns was disabled while these 2 officers were fighting effectively. Lieutenant Burns was mortally wounded and his body jammed the controls. After a headlong fall of 2,500 meters, Lieutenant Hitchcock succeeded in regaining control of this plane and piloted it back to his airbase. Lieutenants McClendon and Plummer were shot down and killed after a vigorous combat with 5 of the enemy's planes. Lieutenants Babcock and Palmer, by gallant and skillful fighting, aided in driving off the German planes and were materially responsible for the successful execution of the photographic mission.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Henry W. Plummer.

- Corporal, Company C, 311th Machine Gun Battalion, 79th Division. Although engaged as company clerk, when the platoon to which he was attached was required to advance over a heavily shelled territory, Corporal Poillon volunteered and carried messages from his company commander to the platoon, the journey being made under the most hazardous conditions and under severest shellfire.
- Private, first class, Headquarters Company, 4th Infantry, 3d Division. He volunteered and went forward to recover the trail of a 37-millimeter gun, despite the great danger of heavy machine-gun fire; he succeeded in recovering and dragging it back to our lines.
- Sergeant, Company D, 31st Infantry. He commanded a platoon of his company during the entire period and led it in 5 different engagements. Hardships were undergone which tested discipline severely, through all of which Sergeant Polaska maintained perfect control, held his platoon at a high state of efficiency, and displayed extraordinary skill in handling it while actually in action, notably at Sitsa, Siberia, June 26, 1919, and at Kazanka, Siberia, July 3, 1919.
- Corporal, Headquarters Company, 4th Infantry, 3d Division. After seeing many of his comrades killed or wounded in attempting the same mission, Corporal Politte went forward under heavy shell and gas bombardment and repaired telephone lines.
- Corporal, Company H, 365th Infantry, 92d Division. During the assault at Bois-Frehaut, Corporal Pollard, a rifle grenadier, conducted his squad skillfully in firing on hostile machine guns until his rifle was broken. He then used his wire cutters with speed and skill under heavy shell and machine-gun fire. Although wounded in his right arm, he continued to cut the wire with his left hand, and assisted his men in getting through it until ordered to the dressing station a second time by his company commander.
- First lieutenant, Field Artillery, observer, 99th Aero Squadron, Air Service. Lieutenant Polley was assigned to a mission to find line troops of the division to which his squadron was attached. Weather conditions made flying almost impossible, a second plane assigned to the mission returning on that account. Flying at an altitude of 25 meters over enemy lines, he encountered and defeated 3 enemy patrols, gathering and delivering to his division headquarters most valuable information.
- Private, Company A, 110th Engineer, 35th Division. When the Infantry attack was held up by direct fire from an enemy concrete machine-gun emplacement, Private Polley, who was a member of a wire-cutting detail, charged the emplacement with 1 Infantry soldier, capturing 2 guns and 2 prisoners and enabling the advance to continue.
- Private, Company G, 308th Infantry, 77th Division. During the period of 4 days, when his battalion was surrounded by the enemy and after his squad leader had been wounded, Private Pollinger took command of the squad, although he himself was suffering from a wound received 4 days previous. His indomitable courage and perseverance upheld the spirit and morale of his men under such trying circumstances and he continued to direct their movements until forced out of action by a second wound.
- First lieutenant, 103d Aero Squadron, Air Service. Having been separated from his patrol, he observed and went to the assistance of an allied plane which was being attacked by 13 of the enemy. Against great odds Lieutenant Ponder destroyed 1 enemy plane and so demoralized the remaining that both he and his comrade were able to return to their lines.
- Brigadier general, 7th Infantry Brigade, 4th Division. At Bois-des-Septesarges on Sept. 27, General Poore personally re-formed his disorganized troops, who were falling back through lack of command and because of severe casualties. Under heavy fire, he led them to the lines, and presented an unbroken front to the enemy. Again on Oct. 11, in the region of Bois-du-Fays, he gathered together troops who were taking refuge from hostile fire, and turned them over to the support commander.
- Private, Company C, 120th Infantry, 30th Division. He was wounded in action between St. Quentin and Cambrai, France, and after having his wounds dressed, he was unable to locate his company. He returned, however, to the front line, and fought throughout the day, locating and returning to his own organization after dark.

- Corporal, Company F, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
After being seriously wounded by machine-gun fire, he remained on duty at his observation post at the river edge, so that the enemy could not cross unobserved.
- Sergeant, Company H, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
When the advance of his platoon was held up by enemy fire, he advanced alone against a machine-gun nest and killed the crew. He brought back the enemy machine gun and the platoon was able to renew the advance. He showed marked personal bravery under heavy fire.
- First sergeant, Company D, 39th Infantry, 4th Division.
When all the officers of his company had become casualties and the morale of the men was sinking, Sergeant Potter assumed command, and after reorganizing the company successfully led it in repelling several vicious hostile counterattacks. During the action he was wounded in the shoulder, but he refused to go to the rear until he was ordered to do so by the officer sent to relieve him.
- Captain, 105th Infantry, 27th Division.
Organizing his units just before entering the town, he advanced under heavy machine-gun and rifle fire, captured the town with numerous prisoners, and from his new position silenced several enemy machine guns. On the morning of Oct. 18, while he was in command, the 105th Infantry Battalion advanced about 300 yards and was stopped by intense machine-gun fire. His coolness and complete indifference to danger inspired his men to further advance despite the heavy machine-gun fire from the strongly held position in a sunken road immediately in the battalion's front, which position was promptly captured, together with numerous prisoners and machine guns.
- Private, Company L, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
He volunteered and crawled out in the face of heavy enemy fire to attack a machine-gun nest. He killed the 4 members of the enemy crew, inspiring the men serving with him by his example of heroism.
- First lieutenant, 20th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
A formation of 8 Liberty bombing planes, while on a daylight bombing mission on Dun-sur-Meuse, was attacked by a force of enemy planes three times its number. Lieutenant Potter saw that the observer's guns of the leading machine were inactive, while its pilot exerted great effort to control his machine. Under conditions demanding greatest courage and determination Lieutenant Potter flew in close to the leader so as to protect him from the rear. This position he held under ever-increasing enemy attack, and in face of the fact that his leader continued on into Germany. The conditions became more desperate, still Lieutenant Potter hung on, until his leader was finally able to make a turn about to the allied lines. On landing it was found that the observer of the leading machine had been killed and had fallen and jammed the controls, making a turn impossible. Lieutenant Potter, by his courage and disregard of danger, saved the life of his leader and brought his machine safely back to our lines.
- Captain, 361st Infantry, 91st Division.
After being painfully wounded by a shell fragment during the night, Captain Potter refused to go to the rear and organized his company for an attack and led it in the advance under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, freely exposing himself and cheering his men by his presence until he was a second time wounded through the lungs, even then refusing to be evacuated until the company was organized and properly turned over to his successor for another attack which was then impending.
- Sergeant, Company B, 111th Machine Gun Battalion, 29th Division.
After all the men of his section except himself and 2 other soldiers had been killed or wounded, he took charge of a machine gun and remained in an isolated position for 4 days, keeping his men constantly in action and inflicting many casualties on the enemy.
- Corporal, Company C, 112th Infantry, 28th Division.
When a platoon of his company was held up by sniper fire, he, undaunted, voluntarily crawled through holes in walls and over roofs, located the enemy sniper, and killed him, enabling the platoon to proceed without further loss. Later in the engagement, when reinforcements and ammunition were needed, he volunteered and swam the Vesle River under machine-gun fire.
- Regimental supply sergeant, Supply Company, 112th Infantry, 28th Division.
While regimental supply sergeant, Supply Company, 112th Infantry, he voluntarily participated in the attack and displayed high courage and determination during the battle, assisting after the village had been captured in removing the seriously wounded across a narrow bridge swept by heavy shell and machine-gun fire. On the evening of Aug. 9, he voluntarily entered the most dangerous parts of the company's position and by his coolness and indifference to danger inspired the men of the command with new courage when they were sorely beset by the enemy, who had gained access to the village. Learning that an enemy patrol had entered a near-by building from the rear, he plunged into the building in complete darkness, dispatched 4 of the enemy, thus retaining possession of the building the loss of which would have placed the command in a precarious position.

- Sergeant, Company A, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
Upon returning with his patrol after a reconnaissance of the enemy's line, Sergeant Purdy was calling the roll of his men and collecting their hand grenades when the pin of one of the grenades became disengaged. Seeing that the grenade could not be thrown away without injuring some of the men, Sergeant Purdy called on them all to run, while he picked up 3 of the grenades, and bending over held them against his stomach. The grenade exploded, killing Sergeant Purdy instantly, but his presence of mind and self-sacrificing act saved the lives of his comrades.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Esther Purdy.

- Sergeant major, Headquarters Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He volunteered and assisted in taking a truck load of ammunition and material into Bouresches, France, over a road swept by artillery and machine-gun fire, thereby relieving a critical situation.
- Private, Company F, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
In response to a call for volunteers to penetrate a heavy enemy barrage and obtain definite information concerning tanks and conditions of enemy front line, he accomplished his mission to the imminent peril of his life.
- Sergeant, Company I, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
He volunteered and accompanied a patrol which was sent out for the purpose of capturing prisoners. Crawling through no man's land, he came upon 2 Germans occupying an outpost. In the struggle that ensued the enemy was overpowered, but the exploit brought forth a destructive fire of rifles and rifle grenades from the enemy, through which Sergeant Quinn successfully maneuvered back to his lines, bringing his captives with him.
- Second lieutenant, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
With a small platoon he attacked and captured a fortified French farmhouse in an open field. He so courageously and skillfully handled his men that this German strong point, held by 100 men and 5 machine guns, was promptly captured.
- Sergeant, Battery F, 10th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
Responding to a call for volunteers, Sergeant Quinn, with 8 other soldiers, manned 2 guns of a French battery which had been deserted by the French during the unprecedented fire after many casualties had been inflicted on their forces. For 2 hours he remained at his post and poured an effective fire into the ranks of the enemy.
- First lieutenant, 139th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While patrolling the lines Lieutenant Quinn, with 1 other pilot, sighted and attacked 4 enemy machines (type Fokker). Several additional enemy planes joined the first 4 and, notwithstanding his great odds, he sent 1 machine crashing to the earth. Motor trouble forced him to drive straight through the enemy formation, and although followed and his machine badly damaged, he was able to outmaneuver and escape from his adversaries.
- Sergeant, Company F, 310th Infantry, 78th Division.
Leading a patrol under heavy fire, he was able to protect an unprotected portion of his line until the next unit could take it over. He was at all times an inspiration to his men, continually exposing himself to danger, while assuring their safety and comfort. After having his legs blown off and receiving other wounds, he gave all necessary information to his successor before allowing himself to be carried away. He died soon after reaching the dressing station. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Charles A. Quiri.
- Private, first class, Company A, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
When the advance of his battalion was checked by heavy machine-gun fire Private Rabinowitz, with 2 other soldiers, went forward under heavy fire to reconnoiter the enemy positions. By effective rifle fire they drove the gunners from 2 machine-gun nests into a dugout near by, which they captured, together with 35 prisoners, including 3 officers.
- Private, Company A, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
While making his way to a first-aid station, after being wounded in 5 places by machine-gun bullets and shrapnel, he encountered 2 Germans. His own rifle having been shot away, Private Raborn picked up a rifle lying near by and shot 1 of the Germans, and in a bayonet duel with the other German killed him also, after he himself had been wounded again during the encounter.
- First lieutenant, 104th Infantry, 26th Division.
Although he had been twice wounded, he refused to be evacuated, and continued on duty with his company during the attack and capture of Trugny under heavy fire until he was incapacitated by a third wound.
- Private, Company A, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
During an intense shell and gas bombardment, he repeatedly volunteered and carried messages and assisted in caring for the wounded at great personal risk. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Gavio Radevick.
- Sergeant, sanitary detachment, 115th Infantry, 29th Division.
For extraordinary heroism in action near Verdun during the drive in which this regiment took part in the vicinity of the Meuse. He displayed great courage and presence of mind in attending to the wounded, not only of the organization to which he was attached, but also of those in adjoining organizations. The exceptionally valuable service performed by this soldier was done under heavy shell and machine-gun fire.
- Private, medical detachment, 2d Engineers, 2d Division.
During the day and night of June 2-3, 1918, he exposed himself to severe and continuous fire beyond the call of duty in order to bring aid to wounded engineers and marines.

Richard C. M. Page, first lieutenant, pilot, Air Service. John I. Rancourt, first lieutenant, observer, 88th Aero Squadron, 103d Field Artillery. For extraordinary heroism in action near Fismes, France, Aug. 9, 1918. These officers were detailed to fly without escort on a visual reconnaissance over the enemy's lines. They were attacked by 6 enemy battle planes 1,800 meters over Fismes. The Americans unhesitatingly fought this superior number of the enemy. Lieutenant Rancourt was 3 times seriously wounded in the legs above the knees, yet he continued to operate his machine gun and shot down 1 of the enemy planes. In spite of the fact that his elevator controls on one side had been shot away, Lieutenant Page skillfully maneuvered the plane throughout the combat and piloted it safely back to his airdrome.

In delivering messages, he voluntarily chose the most direct route, although it was through a machine-gun barrage, to deliver information which prevented the bombardment of positions that had just been occupied. He took the path of danger to save his comrades.

- Second lieutenant, 6th Field Artillery, 1st Division.
He accompanied Maj. John A. Crane, Field Artillery, on a reconnaissance of the enemy's position under intense enemy rifle, machine-gun, and artillery fire; the mission accomplished, Major Crane was seriously wounded while some distance in rear of Lieutenant Ransom and in plain view of the enemy gunners. Lieutenant Ransom returned at once to Major Crane, carried him to a place of comparative shelter, and, despite the heavy enemy fire, sought and found a medical officer, whom he led to the wounded officer. Again leaving shelter he secured a litter and with the assistance of two French soldiers carried the wounded officer to a place of safety.

- Corporal, Company M, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.
In an attack on Cote Dame Marie, the 126th Infantry was held up, owing to intense machine-gun fire and grenades. Corporal Raymond volunteered as a member of a combat patrol which cut through the enemy lines, captured 10 machine guns, killed and captured 15 of the enemy, and forced others to surrender. They cleared that part of the Cote Dame Marie of the enemy, enabling the regiment to continue their advance.
- First lieutenant, 27th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
He piloted 1 machine in a formation of 3 which was escorting 3 reconnaissance planes over enemy territory. On account of motor trouble, he was unable to keep up with his companions, and while thus detached was attacked by an enemy machine. In spite of the condition of his engine and his presence far within the German lines, he vigorously attacked the German plane and destroyed it, after which he succeeded in rejoining his patrol.
- Sergeant, Company G, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
Although under fire for the first time and very ill with a high fever, Sergeant Rayner took charge of the platoon, after the platoon leader had been killed, and effectively directed it for 2 days, in spite of his physical condition, refusing to be evacuated until in a state of collapse.
- Second lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He retained command of his platoon after receiving a severe wound, which rendered him unable to move without assistance, and would not leave the line until ordered by his commanding officer.
- Private, Company K, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.
Acting as a company runner, Private Reach voluntarily carried numerous messages under heavy machine-gun fire, displaying marked courage and devotion to duty.
- Sergeant, Company C, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.
Sergeant Read led the advance of his platoon through heavy enemy fire in the attack against a strongly held enemy position. Although cut off from his company he continued to advance until mortally wounded. Prior to the performance of the above act he distinguished himself by volunteering to conduct and conducting ration details over routes exposed to heavy artillery fire.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Emma Mary Read.
- Private, Company D, 1st Engineers, 1st Division.
He voluntarily went forward over an area swept by machine-gun fire to the aid of a wounded comrade who was entangled in barbed wire. He worked in a perilously exposed position until he extricated his companion and carried him to safety.
- Private, Company B, 6th Machine Gun Battalion, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He and a comrade left shelter and went 200 yards in the open under fire of the enemy and carried a wounded Infantry soldier back to his lines, thereby demonstrating heroic and voluntary disregard of self to save one who could not help himself.
- Sergeant, 43d Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
During the advance of the 43d Company of Marines Sergeant Reath, with great coolness and devotion to duty, attacked an enemy machine-gun nest killing 3 of the enemy and capturing the 2 remaining members of the gun crew, thus enabling his company to continue the advance. This heroic deed was performed by Sergeant Reath under intense enemy machine-gun fire, and greatly inspired the members of his company.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Theodore W. Reath.
- Sergeant, Company C, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.
On the night of Nov. 7 he risked his own life in heavy artillery fire, going from shell hole to shell hole helping his wounded comrades. On Nov. 10 he distributed rations to the men of his company under shell and machine-gun fire.
- Corporal, Battery A, 122d Field Artillery, 33d Division.
Under heavy shellfire he crawled 200 meters to a shell hole in order to draw a sketch of the enemy's position.
- Corporal, Company M, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
He twice volunteered to carry messages from company headquarters to the battalion post of command through heavy machine-gun fire and artillery barrage. He assisted in gathering the elements of the company together after the assault. He volunteered for every dangerous duty and in broad daylight, in full sight of the enemy, dragged wounded to places of shelter.

During the unprecedented artillery bombardment preparatory to the great German offensive of July 15 Lieutenant Reese maintained liaison between different signal units by visiting the positions during the bombardment. It seemed utterly impossible for runners to venture through this fire, yet Lieutenant Reese voluntarily led a detail through the barrage, and thus established communication, also encouraging his men to greatest efforts.

- First lieutenant, 9th Aero Squadron, Air Service
While performing an important aerial mission in his balloon, he was attacked by enemy airplanes. He hung from his basket under fire from enemy machine guns until the balloon burst into flames, when he jumped. He reascended as soon as another balloon could be inflated, although the air was strongly patrolled by the enemy. On Oct. 23, near Gesnes (Meuse), he was in the basket with another observer when a circus of 15 enemy airplanes made an attack from above. He remained in the basket until forced to jump. This officer showed extraordinary heroism by reascending as soon as another balloon could be made ready. Two hours later, while engaged in locating enemy batteries from his balloon, he was again attacked and the balloon burst into flames, forcing him to jump once more. In spite of these experiences this officer continued his mission in another balloon.

- Colonel, 353d Infantry, 89th Division.
On the opening day of the St. Mihiel offensive Colonel Reeves placed himself at the head of the assaulting battalion and personally led the advance from the inception of the attack until the fourth objective was reached. He was constantly exposed to artillery, machine-gun, and rifle fire, and, by his total disregard for personal danger, furnished an inspiring example to his men. On the following day he rallied a battalion of another regiment which had become disorganized and was retreating. Under heavy artillery fire, he reorganized it and sent it forward again at a critical juncture in the attack.

Learning that the enemy was coming through the back of a building, he bravely entered it, killing 4 of the enemy, and retained possession of the building. With 5 or 6 stragglers, he crossed and recrossed a street swept by hostile machine-gun fire and prevented the enemy from filtering through a hole which they had blown in the wall of the building. His courageous actions were an inspiration to his comrades in the desperate fighting. |

- Private, Company D, 354th Infantry, 89th Division.
Knowing that on account of the intense shelling it would be impossible to supply the men in the front line with rations, Private Richards, in a wounded condition, procured a quantity of rations and carried them to the line through heavy shell fire, and personally distributed to each man a portion.
- Captain, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
Displaying valorous leadership throughout the attack on July 18, 1918, near Soissons, France, he was killed while charging enemy machine guns at the head of his command.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. James N. C. Richards.
- Corporal, Company H, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
When his platoon had become scattered during an attack and his platoon commander had been killed, Corporal Richards, although himself seriously wounded, reorganized the platoon under heavy shell and machine-gun fire and turned the platoon over to the next in command ready for the assault before he permitted himself to be evacuated, thereby setting to his associates an example of utter disregard for danger and remarkable coolness and courage in the face of the enemy.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, William Richards.
- Bugler, Company B, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
During the very thickest of the fighting Bugler Richards, assisted by another soldier, attacked 2 enemy machine-gun positions, killing the gunners and capturing the guns, thus allowing the further advance of his company.
- First lieutenant, 326th Infantry, 82d Division.
Leading his platoon in attack, Lieutenant Richards was subjected to fierce and devastating fire of enemy artillery and machine guns. Although he himself was wounded and 90 per cent of his platoon made casualties, he continued to press forward until he was felled by machine-gun fire after reaching the foremost position of the entire attack.
- Private, Company I, 104th Infantry, 26th Division.
Under the leadership of an officer, he and Private Joseph R. Hurltley charged a machine-gun nest, captured 2 guns and killed or captured 12 men.
- Sergeant, Company C, 112th Infantry, 28th Division.
Sergeant Richardson volunteered to go out in the open with a comrade, under hostile machine-gun fire, to rescue a wounded soldier. As they were carrying the latter to shelter he was again struck by a machine-gun bullet and killed, and the companion, also being wounded, was dragged to safety by Sergeant Richardson.
- Second lieutenant, pilot, 1st Aero Squadron, Air Service.
He undertook an Infantry contact patrol mission under weather conditions which necessitated flying at an altitude of only 100 meters. Near the front lines machine guns opened an effective fire on his plane, and he was wounded in the foot, but he continued on the mission until the front lines of the American troops were located and his observer had written out a report for the division commander.
- Major, 306th Machine Gun Battalion, 77th Division.
When the advance on the Tannero by a company of the 308th Infantry was being held up by a heavy hostile fire, Major Richardson, then commanding the 306th Machine Gun Battalion, which had a platoon of machine guns supporting the attack, seeing that the attacking troops were wavering on account of an inexperienced leader and under a heavy hostile fire, with great gallantry and the utmost disregard of personal danger, took command of the company and led it through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire to its objective, which was captured and later consolidated by a skillful disposition of machine guns under his direction.
- Captain, 371st Infantry, 93d Division.
Although badly gassed during the night of Sept. 28, he nevertheless remained in command of his company and with utter disregard of personal danger twice led it in the attack on successive days and was not evacuated until completely exhausted on Sept. 30, 1918.
- Wagoner, Supply Company, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
Wagoner Richford was severely wounded by a shell fragment while driving a wagon containing rations and other supplies for his regiment over a heavily shelled road, but, disregarding his wounds, remained in charge of his wagon until the mission had been accomplished.
- Private, Company M, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
He moved through heavy woods alone under heavy machine-gun fire, flanking dugouts, from which 12 German prisoners were taken. In the action of July 16-19, 1918, near Soissons, France, showing the same fearless qualities, he was killed.

He attacked an enemy Albatross monoplane, and after a vigorous fight, in which he followed his foe into German territory, he succeeded in shooting it down near Vigneulles-le-Hatton Chatel. Oak-leaf clusters (7). One bronze oak leaf is awarded Lieutenant Rickenbacker for each of the following acts of extraordinary heroism in action: On May 17, 1918, he attacked 3 Albatross enemy planes, shooting 1 down in the vicinity of Richecourt, France, and forcing the others to retreat over their own lines. On May 22, 1918, he attacked 3 Albatross monoplanes 4,000 meters over St. Mihiel, France. He drove them back into German territory, separated 1 from the group, and shot it down near Flirey. On May 28, 1918, he sighted a group of 2 battle planes and 4 monoplanes, German planes, which he at once attacked vigorously, shooting down 1 and dispersing the others. On May 30, 1918, 4,000 meters over Jaulny, France, he attacked a group of 5 enemy planes. After a violent battle, he shot down 1 plane and drove the others away. On Sept. 14, 1918, in the region of Villecy, he attacked 4 Fokker enemy planes at an altitude of 3,000 meters. After a sharp and hot action, he succeeded in shooting 1 down in flames and dispersing the other 3. On Sept. 15, 1918, in the region of Bois-de-Wavrille, he encountered 6 enemy planes, who were in the act of attacking 4 Spads, which were below them. Undeterred by their superior numbers, he unhesitatingly attacked them and succeeded in shooting 1 down in flames and completely breaking the formation of the others. On Sept. 25, 1918, near Billy, France, while on voluntary patrol over the lines he attacked 7 enemy planes (5 type Fokker, protecting 2 type Halberstadt). Disregarding the odds against him, he dived on them and shot down 1 of the Fokkers out of control. He then attacked 1 of the Halberstadts and sent it down also.

G. O. No. 27, W. D., 1920.
- Corporal, Company A, 9th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.
Corporal Rosio commanded 1 of the 2 machine guns at the railroad bridge. He exposed himself to heavy machine-gun and artillery fire in order to effectively direct the fire of his guns against the enemy infantry crossing the Marne River. This was done with such effectiveness that many of the enemy boats were sunk and assault halted at the Marne River bank. Later, after his gun was disabled, he made a reconnaissance of the enemy lines and returned with valuable information.

- Corporal, Company A, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
After his company had been halted by machine-gun fire from the front, Corporal Roth advanced ahead of his organization to a position exposed to heavy enemy fire, and opened fire with an automatic rifle on the enemy nest. He continued this fire until killed by the heavy fire directed on him from the enemy machine-gun nest.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Max Roth.
- Corporal, Battery F, 10th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
Responding to a call for volunteers, Corporal Rothwell, with 8 other soldiers, manned 2 guns of a French battery which had been deserted by the French during the unprecedented fire after many casualties had been inflicted on their forces. For 2 hours he remained at his post and poured an effective fire into the ranks of the enemy.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Thomas Rothwell.
- Corporal, Company M, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.
On June 29 he was driven out of his post by hand grenades and machine-gun fire. After the grenades had exploded he reentered his post under machine-gun fire and drove the German gunners away with his automatic rifle. On Oct. 28 he located several machine-gun nests and a battery of field artillery and returned with information which made it possible to destroy them.
- Private, Company L, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
Private Rounds, Corp. Austin J. Kelley, and Pvt. John J. Grady penetrated the enemy's lines in the face of machine-gun fire, captured a machine gun and its crew, and returned with valuable information concerning the enemy's positions.
- Private, 103d Ambulance Company, 101st Sanitary Train, 26th Division.
While assisting a wounded Infantry soldier under heavy shellfire he was severely wounded in the face. Although his injury was more serious than that of the man whom he was attending, he carried the latter to an aid station, after which he voluntarily returned and assisted in first-aid work, inspiring his comrades by his example.
- Captain, 19th Infantry, U. S. Army.
At the outbreak of the Spanish-American campaign Lieutenant Rowan, under disguise, entered the enemy lines in Oriente, crossed the island of Cuba, and not only succeeded in delivering a message to General Garcia, but secured secret information relative to existing military conditions in that region of such great value that it had an important bearing on the quick ending of the struggle and the complete success of the U. S. Army.
- First lieutenant, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.
Being familiar with the ground over which an attack was to be made, he volunteered to leave his own company in the reserve and lead another company which was without officers. The enemy attacked before our own operations were begun, and he was wounded by a machine-gun bullet. Exemplifying in the highest degree the spirit of self-sacrifice and devotion to duty he remained with his command for an hour and a half until the hostile attack was repulsed. He has since died from the wounds received in this engagement.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, R. M. Rowan.
- First sergeant, Company D, 61st Infantry, 5th Division.
In the absence of a commissioned officer and under heavy shell and machine-gun fire, he succeeded in reorganizing the units of his command, and by his fearless example greatly increased the morale of his company. He successfully led them to the attack until he was killed by shellfire.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Clara Oxford.
- Corporal, Company A, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
After being painfully wounded, this soldier continued to lead his squad against a machine gun and silenced it, thereby saving his company many casualties.
- Corporal, Company E, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.
With an automatic-rifle team, he occupied a house in an advanced position west of Fismette on the night of Aug. 12, the loss of which would have jeopardized his company's position and hindered the military operations then taking place. The enemy shot a flare into the house, setting fire to it, but Corporal Rowbottom and a companion, under machine-gun and sniper fire in a brilliantly lighted room, extinguished the flames.
- Sergeant, Company L, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
Although seriously wounded, he continued to lead his platoon in operations against the Hindenburg line, refusing to be evacuated until ordered to the rear by his commanding officer.
- Major, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
For 14½ hours on July 15, 1918, he held his battalion in an advanced and exposed position on the Marne, east of Chateau-Thierry, France, although violently and persistently attacked on his front and on both flanks by greatly superior enemy forces.

- Sergeant, Company M, 311th Infantry, 78th Division.
Assisting his company commander in organizing positions and liaison, he showed great bravery and devotion to duty. Although wounded in the first combat with the enemy, he continued with his work, declining to be evacuated. While patrolling between outposts he was killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Stultz Rowley.
- Bugler, Company H, 104th Infantry, 26th Division.
He displayed notable bravery in delivering messages through violent shellfire. At one time, after 3 other runners had been killed and a fourth wounded, he passed over the same route, undaunted, to carry a message vitally necessary to the successful operation of his company.
- First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
When casualties during the offensive of July 15, 1918, had become so great that it was necessary to work in the open, Lieutenant Royster exposed himself to the severe fire for 10 hours, dressing and caring for the wounded.
- Major, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
For three days near Cantigny, France, May 28-30, 1918, he withstood German assaults under intense bombardment, heroically exposing himself to fire constantly in order to command his battalion effectively, and, although his command lost half its officers and 30 per cent of its men, he held his position and prevented a break in the line at that point.
- First sergeant, Company B, 105th Infantry, 27th Division.
During the operations against the Hindenburg line Sergeant Ruane, with an officer and 2 other sergeants, occupied an outpost position in advance of the line, which was attacked by a superior force of the enemy. Sergeant Ruane assisted in repulsing this attack and in killing 10 Germans, capturing 5, and driving off the others. The bravery and determination displayed by this group was an inspiration to all who witnessed it. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John Ruane.
- Private, Company C, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
He went to the rescue of 2 wounded men over ground so swept by machine-gun fire that 2 men had been killed and 1 wounded previously in the attempt, and succeeded in carrying the 2 wounded men safely to shelter.
- First lieutenant, 304th Engineers, 79th Division.
While reconnoitering to locate the Avocourt-Malancourt Road he was held up by an enemy machine gun on the parapet of a trench running parallel to the road. He proceeded ahead of two men of his platoon and personally disposed of the 2 German gunners.
- First lieutenant, 27th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Outnumbered and handicapped by his presence far behind the German lines, he and 3 flying companions fought brilliantly a large group of enemy planes, bringing down or putting to flight all in the attacking party, while performing an important mission near Luneville, France, on June 13, 1918.
- Supply sergeant, Company M, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.
Having been left behind to care for the equipment of the company and, seeing the difficult position in which the company had been placed, and noticing that a large number of his comrades were being evacuated because of wounds, Sergeant Ruddock joined the company and assisted in pushing the advance to its objective. He remained until the remnants of the command had been ordered back out of range of friendly artillery. He was mortally wounded on Nov. 10, after routing out 2 machine-gun nests. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Alexander M. Ruddock.
- Private, Headquarters Company, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
He successfully carried messages through terrific artillery and machine-gun fire and was twice wounded while performing the mission.
- Corporal, Company C, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.
Acting voluntarily, Corporal Rudolph and 2 other soldiers went out under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire and attacked an enemy machine-gun nest, killing 4 of the crew and capturing 11 prisoners, together with the machine gun.
- Captain, 11th Infantry, 5th Division.
When an enemy machine gun suddenly opened fire on his company Captain Rudolph signaled the platoon on his right to execute a flanking movement, while he advanced alone toward the gun. He killed the enemy gunner with his pistol and captured the remainder of the crew. He then ordered the captured gun carried along in the advance, and 200 yards farther used it successfully in silencing another enemy machine gun which was holding up his company. Captain Rudolph was severely wounded by a hand grenade on Oct. 21, but refused to go to the rear, and remained with his company for 12 hours, inspiring his men to hold an important position against a superior force of the enemy.

- Private, 101st Ambulance Company, 101st Sanitary Train, 26th Division.
He assisted in establishing a dressing station in a dugout in an advanced position. When it was destroyed by shell he worked unceasingly in the open under fire from enemy machine guns and snipers, caring for the wounded. He remained at his post for several hours after his station had been ordered closed, permitting neither his own exhaustion nor the enemy fire to deter him from aiding the wounded.
- Second lieutenant, 114th Infantry, 29th Division.
While advancing on an enemy position under direct machine-gun fire, he was seriously wounded but remained with his platoon until he died.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Henry Running.
- Sergeant, Company A, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.
Sergeant Runyan assumed command of a platoon after all other sergeants of the platoon had become casualties and led it through several successive attacks. Although wounded in the head by a machine-gun bullet he refused to go to the rear for medical attention but remained in command of the platoon until his company was relieved.
- Sergeant, Company G, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Sergeant Rupholdt held his post on the bank of the Marne until nearly his entire platoon had been annihilated and he himself wounded. After being carried a short distance to the rear he continued to direct the defense of the position until killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, August Rupholdt.
- Sergeant, Company D, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.
While in command of a flank platoon of the battalion, Sergeant Ruppel overcame 3 enemy machine-gun groups and personally led the flanking patrol when his platoon was held up by enemy machine-gun fire.
- First lieutenant, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.
Although previously wounded several times Lieutenant Rusch steadfastly remained in command of his platoon of machine guns and gallantly led it forward into position through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire to support his Infantry, which had been held up by enemy fire. By his timely action, his skill in the location of his guns and the direction of their fire, and his absolute disregard of personal danger, he quickly caused the withdrawal of the enemy machine guns, thus enabling his Infantry to advance from its precarious position where it was suffering heavy losses from direct fire of enemy machine guns and artillery.
- Pharmacist's mate, second class, U. S. Navy, attached to 2d Battalion, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He gave proof of remarkable courage and disregard for personal safety by remaining at his post for 3 days under heavy shellfire and rendering first aid to the wounded, even when his dressing station was hit by a large shell.
- Corporal, Company M, 339th Infantry, 85th Division (detachment in North Russia).
Corporal Russell assumed command of a Russian machine-gun crew, in addition to his own, and held his position for 10 hours against determined attacks of a greatly superior force. When the enemy fire was so severe as to cause the Russians to temporarily leave their gun, he himself took charge of the gun and continued the fire.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, William Russell.
- Master engineer, Company D, 105th Engineers, 30th division.
He commanded a platoon of engineers, following the first wave of the Infantry for the purpose of clearing a road for the artillery. Under heavy shell and machine-gun fire, he directed the work with exceptional ability, at one time leading his platoon in advance of the Infantry. By organizing covering parties and utilizing 2 automatic riflemen, who had become separated from their own unit, he kept his platoon intact, capturing 35 prisoners and cleaning out 3 machine-gun nests in the course of his operations. While making a reconnaissance ahead of his platoon he personally took 9 Germans, after wounding their officer. As a result of his skillful leadership and gallant conduct his mission was successfully carried out.
- Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 325th Infantry, 82d Division.
At a critical moment during a hostile counterattack, Private Rutherford single-handedly mounted a machine gun, under heavy enemy fire, and operated it at close range against the advancing enemy, repulsing the counterattack by his bravery.
- Corporal, Company L, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
Accompanied by a comrade, Corporal Ruusulehto volunteered to attack an enemy machine-gun position, the fire from which was enfilading the position held by his platoon. During the attack his comrade was killed, but Corporal Ruusulehto, by a flank movement, reached the position, killed 2 members of the crew, and forced 2 others to surrender.

At Bois-de-Foret, France, Oct. 6-13,
R—Chicago, Ill.
B—Chicago, Ill.
G. O. No. 51, W. D., 1919.
- Corporal, Headquarters Company, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
Corporal Sattler was in charge of all runners at advance post of command of the regiment. The area was heavily gassed. Although so badly gassed that his eyes were swollen shut and his voice affected, he refused to be evacuated but continued on duty. On Oct. 10, when all runners were killed, wounded, or gassed, he repeatedly carried many important messages in order to maintain communication.
- *SAUER, JOSEPH (1708815)----- Near Binerville, France, Oct. 2, 1918.
R—New York, N. Y.
B—Pittsburgh, Pa.
G. O. No. 35, W. D., 1919.
- Corporal, Company F, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
He volunteered in the face of heavy enemy machine-gun fire to deliver a message to a platoon sergeant who was leading an attack on enemy machine-gun nests. He was wounded in one leg just as he started and was wounded in the other leg before reaching the sergeant, but did, by calling aloud, deliver the message verbally and accurately.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Joseph Sauer.

The artillery of the 26th Division desiring its batteries to be adjusted upon objectives in front of the division, Captain Saunders volunteered to make the attempt, although the weather was most unfavorable to flying. After flying two hours amid heavy antiaircraft fire and having adjusted the fire of 3 batteries his plane was hit and disabled. Returning to his airdrome he secured another plane and returned to the enemy line to complete his mission. After another hour in the air he was again forced on account of motor trouble to return to the airdrome. Obtaining a third plane he again returned to the lines, the weather conditions forcing him to proceed for a considerable distance behind the enemy lines and at low altitude. Flying thus for an hour his plane was hit by antiaircraft fire and badly damaged. With one control shot away, and his propeller likewise injured, he still continued to adjust, always at low altitude and under constant enemy fire, until his mission was successfully accomplished. The heroic conduct of Captain Saunders served as a splendid example of soldierly devotion to duty to the men of his squadron. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, W. L. Saunders. |

D., 1919.  | First sergeant, Company E, 311th Infantry, 78th Division. He was directed to lead an attack against an enemy machine-gun nest which was impeding the progress of his company. Reaching a point within 50 feet of the stronghold, he ordered an attack, and 6 Germans near the gun sought to surrender until they saw the strength of his force, now reduced through casualties to 2 or 3 men. The enemy was then reinforced by 20 men and launched a severe counterattack, which forced Sergeant Schroth to abandon his attack. After ordering his men to safety, he remained at his post alone, fighting against the superior forces until he drove a prisoner back to our lines at the point of his empty pistol. Despite his desire to provide safety for his patrol, he was the only survivor to return from the mission. |
| SCHUCHART, FRANK (2057101)-----Near Juvigny, France, Aug. 30, 1918,and in the Argonne Forest, France,Nov. 8, 1918.R—Belmont, Wis.B—Liberty, Wis.G. O. No. 95, W. D., 1919. | Private, Company I, 128th Infantry, 32d Division. During the attack near Juvigny Private Schuchart, while acting as runner, repeatedly exposed himself to severe enemy artillery and machine-gun fire. After the attack he voluntarily joined in the work of clearing the field of wounded under a heavy enemy fire. On Nov. 8, while carrying an important message, he was severely wounded in the left leg. He stopped in a shell hole, dressed the wound himself, proceeded to deliver the message, and did not report for treatment.  |

He and his observer, Lieutenant Stokes, continued on and joined a formation of another bombing squadron. After crossing the lines their plane was struck by an antiaircraft explosive shell, throwing the machine out of control. When Lieutenant Seaver gained control of the machine it had fallen away from the protection of the other planes. With their crippled plane and missing motor they continued until they reached their objective, when their motor died completely. An enemy plane attacked, but Lieutenant Stokes kept him off until his machine coasted to their own lines. |

Oct. 7-20, 1918.
R—Signal Mountain, Tenn.
B—Fall River, Tenn.
G. O. No. 44, W. D., 1919.
- Private, 82d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Exposing himself to enemy fire, Private Sexton, with another soldier, courageously advanced ahead of their platoon and captured 5 machine guns and 14 prisoners.
- Private, Company F, 353d Infantry, 89th Division.
With another soldier, Private Seymour advanced more than 150 yards over an open space swept by fire from 30 enemy machine guns, for the purpose of drawing the fire of these guns, while the remainder of his company attacked them from the flanks. His self-sacrificing act cost him his life, but enabled his comrades to capture the hostile position.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, James O. Seymour.
- Private, Company E, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
When a part of his company was held up by machine-gun fire this soldier, with the aid of 2 others, flanked 2 machine guns, killed the gunners, and captured the guns, thereby allowing the company to advance without delay or losses. Later on in the same advance he crept up to a German machine-gun emplacement, rolled over the parapet onto the gun crew, putting gun and gunners out of action.
- Corporal, Company M, 139th Infantry, 35th Division.
Corporal Shahan, regimental liaison noncommissioned officer, with great courage constantly exposed himself to heavy enemy machine-gun and shellfire for 3 days in maintaining liaison between his regimental headquarters and the companies in the front line. On Sept. 29 he attacked, single handed, an enemy machine-gun nest killing several of the enemy and taking 1 prisoner. While making his way back to his lines he was fired upon by another German machine gun, which wounded him in the right arm, and was at the same time attacked by his prisoner. In spite of his wound, he killed the German with his pistol and reached his lines in safety.
- Private, Company A, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.
After his company had taken shelter from the enflaming machine-gun and trench-mortar fire of the enemy, Private Shawwood, with 2 other soldiers, crawled to the aid of wounded comrades, thus saving the lives of at least 2, while exposed to terrific fire of the enemy.
- Second lieutenant, 56th Infantry, 7th Division.
Although twice wounded by machine-gun fire while leading his men in an attack on Preny Ridge, under heavy machine-gun fire, Lieutenant Shallenberger continued in the advance until he was killed by the explosion of a shell.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, H. D. Shallenberger.
- Private, first class, Headquarters Company, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
At Vaux, July 1, 1918, having entered a cellar to install his telephone, he was attacked by 11 of the enemy, of whom he killed 2 and took 9 prisoners, single handed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Joseph Shamanski.
- Sergeant, Company I, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
In the face of violent artillery and machine-gun fire near Sergy and Seringes, France, on July 28, 1918, he selected a squad of men and rushed a machine gun that had been harassing his company with its fire. He reached and captured the gun and killed the crew.
- Corporal, Company I, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.
Seeing the commanding officer of an adjacent unit fall from a wound, Corporal Shane left his place of safety and made his way through the continuous rain of machine-gun bullets to the side of the wounded officer. After a severe struggle he managed to drag him to a place of safety.
- Corporal, Company K, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
When the advance of his company was held up, he volunteered to go forward with another soldier, to reduce a machine-gun emplacement. Advancing in front of our lines, these 2 soldiers attacked the enemy position, destroyed it, and captured 3 prisoners. Corporal Shankle was killed in action shortly afterwards.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Brooks B. Shankle.
- First lieutenant, 11th Infantry, 5th Division.
Forbidding his men to leave their place of safety, Lieutenant Shanklin went forth in the face of heavy machine-gun fire, located and sighted his 37-millimeter gun, receiving wounds which proved fatal.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Walton Shanklin.
- Sergeant, Company K, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
Throughout the engagement he led his platoon with great bravery and distinction, participating constantly in the severe fighting of that period, despite a painful wound in the hand and another in the arm, received the first day of the engagement. He gave unsparingly of his strength while helping others in addition to his own work until his company had been relieved. He dropped unconscious from exhaustion and the effects of his wound soon after turning over his platoon to the second in command.

- SIGNOR, HENRY L. (10401)----- Near Sommerance, France, Oct. 11, 1918.
R—Worcester, Mass.
B—Clinton, Mass.
G. O. No. 15, W. D., 1919.
- Private, first class, section 647, Ambulance Service.
Following the advance of the Infantry, he caused his car to be lifted across a mine crater by some infantrymen, and proceeding for 3 kilometers down a road heavily bombarded with gas and high-explosive shells, he evacuated wounded from a culvert only 400 yards from enemy outposts. On the return trip his car was struck by splinters from an exploding shell which pierced the clothing of his aid and caused fresh wounds to one of his patients. After transferring his wounded across the crater to another car, he succeeded in driving it over a road almost destroyed by shellfire to a newly established dressing station in Sommerance. He continued to operate his car for 12 hours until he was relieved, having at all times displayed unhesitating courage and devotion to duty.

- Sergeant, Company I, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
During the assault near Soissons, Sergeant Simpson, although severely wounded continued in action for several hours, leading a group of men beyond and back of an enemy machine-gun emplacement in order to flank it and make the Infantry advance at this point possible. He succeeded, but while engaged in this courageous duty he was killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Mary Simpson.
- Captain, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
He took command of a platoon that had become separated from its command, reorganized it, and showed marked personal courage in leading it forward under heavy fire. He called for volunteers and then led them in an attack upon a machine-gun nest that had been holding up our advance. With 2 men he charged the nest, captured the gun, and killed the crew.
- Second Lieutenant, 56th Infantry, 7th Division.
In charge of a patrol, Lieutenant Simpson had located the exact position of the enemy and was withdrawing, when he discovered that 1 man was missing. Although wounded himself, he went back, finding that the man had been killed and was entangled in the enemy's wire. Unable to recover the body and being wounded the second time, he covered the withdrawal of his patrol and returned with his report.
- Private, Company A, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
After being wounded Private Simpson returned to the line and continued to carry messages with absolute disregard for his own safety until he was wounded the second time.
- Private, 47th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He carried a message from battalion to company headquarters directly across the face of enemy fire. Shot through the chest he continued running and called out, "I must deliver this message," struggling forward for 50 feet more in his heroic effort to carry out his mission before falling.
- Second Lieutenant, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
He went out into the open under heavy machine-gun fire and succeeded in carrying back for a distance of about 25 yards a wounded officer and a wounded soldier.
- Private, Company M, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
While assisting his automatic-rifle squad in a most advanced position Private Sims and those about him were seriously wounded by shrapnel. Realizing that his wounds were fatal and that his comrades might be saved, he insisted that the stretcher bearers attend to the others. His unusual heroism was instrumental in saving the lives of his fellow soldiers even at the cost of his own. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Willie C. Sims.
- Private, Company A, 13th Machine Gun Battalion, 5th Division.
While acting as a runner he showed exceptional bravery in carrying messages through a heavily shelled and gassed area. After being wounded in the hand he made 12 trips from Frapelle to his company headquarters at Chapelle St. Clair.
- Private, Company K, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
Rushing through rifle and machine-gun fire for a distance of 75 meters, Private Sinatra rescued a wounded comrade; and, while carrying him to safety, was himself seriously wounded. He continued on with his comrade, however, until he reached cover, administering first aid to the other man before attending to his own wound.
- Corporal, Company M, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
When the advance was checked by fire from enemy machine guns and snipers in a sunken trench, Corporal Sinclair, crawling and jumping from 1 shell hole to another, under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, opened fire with his automatic rifle and silenced both the machine-gun post and the snipers.
- Private, 55th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He, alone, reconnoitered the position of enemy machine guns which were holding up the advance of his company across the Meuse. After he had located them he silenced the fire of 2 guns, thus making possible the continuance of his company's advance.
- Private, first class, Company G, 310th Infantry, 78th Division.
While his company was on outpost duty Private Siner crawled out from a trench under heavy enemy fire, to rescue a wounded comrade and was instantly killed by a bursting shell just as he had reached the wounded man.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Lillie C. Siner.
- Private, Machine Gun Company, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
On Oct. 15, though severely wounded, he refused to be evacuated and continued to perform his duties as platoon runner under difficult and dangerous conditions. On Oct. 18 he exposed himself to heavy machine-gun and artillery fire in order to carry water to other members of his platoon, in the performance of which task he was mortally wounded.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, J. D. Singleton.

He displayed the highest qualities—courage, fearlessness, and leadership—in the handling of his section in the Meuse-Argonne offensive. On Nov. 6, 1918, with utter disregard for his own personal safety, he successfully ran communication lines from headquarters, 1st Infantry Brigade, to the headquarters of the 16th and 18th Infantry Regiments, keeping the brigade commander in constant touch with the commanding officers of these regiments. Arriving at the headquarters of the 18th Infantry and finding a shortage of equipment and men, he personally directed the running of communication lines to the front-line battalion at the imminent risk of his life through heavy shell and machine-gun fire. The lines were successfully laid under most hazardous circumstances. Lieutenant Slingo working all the while under direct observation and shellfire of the enemy. His courageous action at a most trying moment was an inspiration to all and assisted materially in the success of this operation.

Lieutenant Smart volunteered to run back with a message to the rear through a dense enemy concentration of high-explosive shell and gas, after all of the Infantry and Artillery runners had been either killed or wounded in attempting this same mission. Lieutenant Smart was acting as Artillery liaison officer with the attacking units of the 102d Infantry. When the Infantry still met enemy resistance at Marcheville and all communications to the rear had been cut by the heavy enemy barrage laid down in rear of the attacking force, Lieutenant Smart, at the risk of his own life, ran through the barrage to a forward telephone station, communicated the situation to the Artillery commander and then ran back through the same barrage and rejoined and remained with the Infantry commander. |

When all the runners of his platoon had failed to establish liaison with the platoon on the left he succeeded in getting through with a message. On his return trip he was twice wounded, but dragged himself along the ground and delivered his message before lapsing into unconsciousness.
- First lieutenant, 3d Brigade, Tank Corps.
He displayed bravery and leadership of a high order in the advance toward Montfaucon by going out ahead of the engineers, reconnoitering a tank route under fire, and urging the tanks forward. He located the resistance in the Bois-de-Cuis in advance, later rallying disorganized soldiers and enabling them to hold the Bois-de-Cuis.
- First lieutenant, 28th Infantry, 2d Division.
When the officers of his unit were killed or wounded at Cantigny, France, May 28, 1918, and although he himself had been wounded early in the attack and suffered intensely, he took command, refused to leave his post, and, by heroic courage and resolution in resisting counterattacks, contributed in great measure to the successful defense of his sector.
- Private, Machine Gun Company, 364th Infantry, 91st Division.
He volunteered and remained with a wounded comrade in a gun position when his division was relieved. He gave all the aid possible and then went some 500 meters through heavy shell and machine-gun fire for further medical assistance and returned with it to his companion.
- Corporal, Company B, 307th Field Signal Battalion, 82d Division.
After being on duty continuously for 36 hours, on Oct. 13, 1918, he volunteered to repair telephone lines which had been cut by shellfire. Under extremely heavy bombardment he worked all night repairing breaks in lines and thereby making possible constant communication with 1 of the advanced regiments. On Oct. 21, 1918, after 1 of his helpers had been killed and the other wounded by heavy shellfire, he continued on alone and repaired the telephone lines, displaying unusual bravery and devotion to duty.
- Private, Company E, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
When his platoon was held up by a machine gun he, with 2 other privates, who were killed before reaching the emplacement, charged the gun, killed the crew of 5 Germans, and captured their gun.
- Second lieutenant, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
Accompanied by another soldier of his platoon, Lieutenant Soules entered the town of Noyers-Pout-Maugis, which was held by the enemy, against murderous machine-gun fire. He routed the gunners, killing 1, thereby saving his company from a harassing flanking fire.
- Major, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
Immediately after an enemy barrage was laid down on his assaulting line, Major Southard pushed forward through the halting ranks and, calling on his men to follow, advanced at double time to the storming of Torcy, attaining his objective. He then organized the defense of the town, supervising the work under hazardous artillery, machine-gun, and sniper fire. During the attack Major Southard's forces suffered heavily from casualties, yet he resolutely held his position for 2 days, after which he was wounded while leading an assault upon the heights beyond Belleau.
- Private, Headquarters Company, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.
He was helping to remove a great many wounded men from a dressing station to a place of comparative safety when a heavy enemy bombardment began. He forced 4 German prisoners to assist him and repeatedly entered the heavily shelled area, bringing out wounded men.
- First lieutenant, 2d Engineers, 2d Division.
Seeing a combat patrol suddenly fired upon by an enemy machine-gun nest and hard pressed, Lieutenant Spafford went to its relief, courageously leading an attack on the nest. Although wounded in the arm during the attack, he continued in the action of the attack until he received a second wound, which caused his death.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, James Spafford.
- Corporal, Company E, 322d Infantry, 81st Division.
Leading his squad against 6 enemy machine guns, during which time he was hit twice by the exacting fire therefrom, he drove the enemy from the stronghold, making possible the further advance of his company.
- Private, Company L, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
He was on a patrol with 3 other soldiers when they were fired upon by a hostile machine gun 50 yards in advance of the line. After several hand grenades had been thrown at the machine-gun nest one of the crew was seen crawling away. Private Spamanato killed this man with his rifle and then rushed the nest alone, capturing the gun and 3 surviving members of the crew, 2 others having been killed by hand grenades.

- First lieutenant, 115th Infantry, 29th Division.
Upon returning from a raid which he led against enemy trenches, Lieutenant Sprague found 1 of his men was missing. Accompanied by 1 man, he promptly and voluntarily returned through artillery, machine-gun, and rifle fire, found the missing man, who had been wounded, and carried him back to the American lines.
- Private, Company C, 1st Engineers, 1st Division.
When volunteers were called for by his company commander, Private Springer volunteered and rescued wounded comrades from a barrage. Disregarding danger to himself, he continued the performance of these heroic deeds until killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Margaret Springer.
- First lieutenant, 148th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Attacking 3 enemy planes (type Fokker) who were driving on 1 of our planes, Lieutenant Springs, after a short and skillful flight, drove off 2 of the enemy and shot down the third. On the same day he attacked a formation of 5 enemy planes (type Fokker) and, after shooting down 1 plane, was forced to retire because of lack of ammunition.
- Sergeant, Company E, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
After his platoon commander had been wounded Sergeant Springs took command, reorganized, and led the platoon forward through heavy fire to all its objectives, in which attack he was severely wounded. He also rendered gallant service before Montdidier and St. Mihiel, during both of which operations he was wounded.
- First sergeant, Company A, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
Throughout the engagement he encouraged his men by his gallant conduct. After the company was ordered to withdraw, he voluntarily returned to the position his company had held and, throughout the night of July 15-16, assisted in evacuating the wounded.
- First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 4th Machine Gun Battalion, 2d Division.
When a platoon was being heavily gassed and under intense artillery and machine-gun fire, he voluntarily left the shelter of his dressing station, proceeded to the line, and rendered invaluable aid to the wounded. On Oct. 9, he again left the shelter of his dressing station, and under intense fire voluntarily went to the assistance of the wounded of the 141st Infantry.
- Captain, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.
Directed to advance to a new position, he led his men forward with great gallantry. Although painfully wounded in the back and leg by shell fragments, he remained on duty with his men, inspiring them by his courage and coolness to hold a difficult position against repeated attacks by the enemy in force for a period of 24 hours.
- Captain, 306th Infantry, 77th Division.
While the vicinity of the regimental command post where he was stationed was under heavy bombardment, Captain Stadie, without thought of personal danger, voluntarily ran outside, through shrapnel and high-explosive shells, and rescued a wounded runner.
- First lieutenant, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
Lieutenant Staehel personally led a platoon in the attack of Hill 258. He rushed 25 yards ahead of his platoon and single handed captured 3 of the enemy. His platoon, inspired by his deeds, succeeded in forcing 63 others to surrender.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Emma Staehel.
- Sergeant, Company D, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
Personally reconnoitering an enemy position, Sergeant Stafford encountered and captured single handed 6 of the enemy.
- Private, first class, Company L, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
Locating an enemy machine-gun nest, Private Stafford, upon his own initiative, organized a patrol and led it in an attack on the hostile position, silencing the gun and capturing 18 prisoners, thereby facilitating the advance of his company.
- Second lieutenant, 3d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division.
After being severely wounded at the beginning of the engagement near Berzy-le-Sec, France, July 18, 1918, he continued to lead his command forward until he had taken positions assigned to him. He declined medical assistance and did not retire to an aid station until he had seen to the disposition and security of his men.
- Second lieutenant, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
While his battalion was being held up by heavy machine-gun fire he voluntarily led a small detachment of his platoon forward. He advanced far into enemy territory and succeeded in capturing 7 machine-gun nests and 47 prisoners, continuing with his mission until he was killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. L. Stainton.

- Second lieutenant, observer, 166th Aero Squadron, Air Service. While on a bombing raid back of the German line he, accompanied by his pilot, was attacked by 6 German pursuit planes. They were forced to leave the formation in which they were traveling, owing to engine trouble; the enemy began riddling their plane with machine-gun fire. Lieutenant Steele fought them on all sides, and is credited by members of the 11th Aero Squadron, who were flying over him several thousand feet, with having brought down one of his opponents. He was wounded twice in the leg and twice in the arm and continued fighting, although each time he was hit he was knocked down into the observer's cockpit. At last, however, only his tail gun was in working condition, the other 2 having been disabled by bullets, and he sank unconscious into the cockpit.

advance of his platoon and assured himself that it would not be checked.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Phoebe J. Stevens.
- Second lieutenant, 147th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
He, with 4 other pilots, attacked 12 enemy aircraft (type Pfalz), flying in 2 groups well within the enemy lines. As soon as the enemy planes were sighted he maneuvered to get between them and the sun, and with great difficulty gained the advantage. While 3 of the other American officers dived on the lower formation, he and Second Lieut. Kenneth L. Porter engaged the upper formation in a bold and brilliant combat, 2 planes of which they crashed to the earth.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Effie Stevens.
- First lieutenant, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
Commanding a small detachment, he charged and captured a strong enemy authority. During times not so occupied he administered aid to the wounded, crawling to stricken comrades at imminent risk of his own life, through areas swept by machine-gun fire. Through disregard of danger he was the means of saving many wounded men.

- Sergeant, Company C, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.
Sergeant Stevenson and another soldier voluntarily went through heavy machine-gun fire to carry an important message to an advanced unit. Attracted by the cries of a wounded soldier while they were returning they went to his assistance, and, in doing so, Sergeant Stevenson was mortally wounded.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Doris Stevenson.
- Corporal, Company F, 319th Infantry, 80th Division.
He voluntarily left shelter and crawled in the open under heavy machine-gun fire to the aid of a wounded soldier. While trying to dress the latter's injuries he was killed by a machine-gun bullet.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John G. Stevenson.
- Second lieutenant, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
He displayed splendid devotion to duty by twice passing through a terrific artillery and machine-gun barrage in order to transmit important orders from his brigade commander to the assaulting battalion, and while in the performance of such duty was seriously wounded, but refused to be evacuated before he had made his report.
- Private, Company G, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
Private Stewart, having been wounded in the head, advanced with fearless disregard for his own personal safety against an enemy machine-gun nest and succeeded in putting it out of action by bombing the gunners. He was killed immediately thereafter by an enemy machine-gun fire.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John H. Stewart.
- Corporal, Company M, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
After his officer had been wounded by shellfire, Corporal Stewart, suffering from seven wounds about the knee, from the same shell, took command of his platoon, led it in the assault to the objective, and established it in line.
- Private, Company B, 7th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.
As a motorcycle rider he worked steadily for 24 hours without rest. He was struck by shrapnel, which wounded him in the neck, back, and in both legs, but he continued on duty in spite of these injuries.
- Corporal, Company D, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
Corporal Stewart exposed himself to heavy fire to advance 100 yards in advance of his company in order to locate enemy machine-gun positions. Coming suddenly upon an enemy machine-gun nest, he forced 12 of the enemy to surrender and then continued his reconnaissance.
- Sergeant, Company I, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
After he had seen several of his comrades fall in the attempt to accomplish the mission, Sergeant Stewart volunteered to carry an important message through a heavy shell and gas bombardment.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John Stewart.

- Captain, Medical Corps, attached to 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
The observation post of his regiment having been destroyed by enemy shell-fire and a number of men wounded, Captain Stiff volunteered to go to the aid of the wounded men if a guide were furnished. The offer was declined as it was thought to be too hazardous an undertaking, the entire zone being swept by intense enemy machine-gun and artillery fire. Captain Stiff insisted upon making the attempt, and in company with Corporal Blankenship of the Headquarters Company, started on his mission despite the protests of officers and men acquainted with the terrain. Under terrific enemy fire they made their way to the outpost position, found the wounded men whose wounds they dressed, and led the disabled men to places of shelter.

Possessing the only automatic rifle in the group, Private Strange fearlessly opened fire on the enemy from an exposed position until his automatic rifle jammed and his left arm was paralyzed by a wound. He succeeded in clearing the jam, however, and immediately resumed firing despite his left arm being disabled, driving off the enemy, and breaking up the counterattack through his exceptional fortitude and determination. Shortly afterwards he was again wounded by a bursting shell. |

- Sergeant, Company F, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
He displayed exceptional courage and initiative by leading his platoon to the attack and capture of a battery of 77-millimeter guns. After the successful accomplishment of this unusual and heroic duty he was killed in action. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Eugene Sullivan.
- Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
For extraordinary heroism in action north of the River Ourcq, July 29, 1918, while advancing against the enemy. No messengers being available, he volunteered to carry messages from the machine-gun company commander to the battalion commander, crossing an open valley swept by machine-gun and shellfire, part of the distance of 200 meters being in water waist deep. This journey accomplished twice within an hour made possible proper liaison between the company and battalion commanders.
- Private, Company H, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
On Oct. 5 he twice left his place of shelter and advanced under intense machine-gun fire to the rescue of wounded comrades, bringing them back to a place of safety where they could be cared for.
- Private, Company A, 9th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.
- Corporal, Company M, 362d Infantry, 91st Division.
Observing that the left flank of the regimental line was unprotected, he voluntarily took out a combat patrol and while so doing encountered 3 machine guns, which were employing effective enfilade fire. Boldly advancing on this position, he silenced the guns.
- Private, Battery B, 104th Field Artillery, 27th Division.
When a continuous bombardment had set fire to the camouflage covering of a large ammunition dump of 75-millimeter shells and exploded 9 of the shells, he, utterly disregarding his personal safety, left a sheltered position and ran to the dump and, with the aid of 3 other men, extinguished the fire, not only saving the ammunition but also preventing the exact locating of the dump by the enemy.
- First lieutenant, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
After his company commander had been seriously wounded and he himself wounded in the head by a machine-gun bullet, Lieutenant Sullivan continued to lead and encourage his men until wounded the second time. He then continued in command of the company until ordered to be evacuated by his battalion commander.
- Major general, U. S. Army.
General Summerall, commanding the 1st Division, visited, with great gallantry and with utter disregard for his own safety, the extreme front lines of his division and personally made a reconnaissance of the position in the face of heavy hostile machine-gun and artillery fire, exhorting his men to renew the attack on Berzy-le-Sec, promising them a powerful artillery support, and so encouraging them by his presence and example that they declared their readiness to take the town for him. Due to his great courage and utter disregard for his own safety, the men of his division were inspired to enormous and heroic efforts, capturing Berzy-le-Sec the next morning under terrific enemy fire, and later in the day the division reached all its objectives.
- Private, Company H, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
In the face of direct machine-gun fire he left cover and went out 100 yards to rescue a wounded soldier. Dragging the wounded man back to his funk hole, he gave him first aid, and then again exposing himself to enemy fire obtained water for him. He showed utter disregard for personal danger in aiding other wounded men in addition to performing his duties as scout.
- Sergeant, Company I, 112th Infantry, 28th Division.
Sergeant Summerton, having on his body several aggravated wounds from an enemy grenade and being tagged for evacuation for these, as well as for grippie, when assured that his company was about to attack Chatel-Chebery and that it had lost all its officers, went back to his company and courageously and skillfully led it as the first wave, and while so doing was again wounded.
- Captain, 372d Infantry, 93d Division.
During the attack on Bussy Farm and Sechault he courageously led his command under the most intense artillery fire and in the face of a fusillade of machine-gun bullets. Although he was suffering from the effects of gas and had been twice knocked down by explosion of shells, he remained on duty, and, inspired by his example, his men overcame the strong enemy resistance.
- Private, Company L, 353d Infantry, 89th Division.
Private Sundin, while advancing through wooded territory with 4 other men, was surprised by the fire of 6 machine guns. Though 2 of the party were wounded, Private Sundin, with great daring, worked around the flank of the position and succeeded in routing the enemy machine gunners in time to permit the advance without casualties of 2 platoons operating near by.

- First lieutenant, 95th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Accompanied by Lieutenant Hambleton, he answered an alert to Lironville and encountered 5 enemy planes in the vicinity of St. Mihiel. As they approached, the enemy turned away. Lieutenant Taylor and Lieutenant Hambleton followed and at Pont-a-Mousson again came up with them, flying 1 at 1,500 meters, 2 at 2,000 meters, and the remaining 2 above at 2,500 meters. Lieutenant Hambleton attacked the lowest one, firing 20 rounds and forcing it from the formation, while Lieutenant Taylor remained above to protect him and to keep off the other enemy planes. An enemy bullet having shot the cross-section wires of Lieutenant Hambleton's plane away, the splinters from same cutting his cheek and right shoulder, he turned from combat to ascertain damage to his plane. As the enemy plane was falling Lieutenant Taylor opened fire and immediately brought the German down.

- Private, Company C, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
After his platoon had withdrawn from their position he volunteered and returned to the position formerly occupied in an attempt to rescue a wounded comrade. He crossed a field swept by unusually intensive machine-gun fire, continuing in his attempted rescue until himself wounded.
- Sergeant, Company L, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
Although he was himself severely wounded in the attack on the Bois-les-Jamblets, yet he attempted to carry in another wounded man, passing through severe machine-gun fire from the front and from the flanks. While doing so he received a second wound, which caused his death.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Edward A. Teichler.
- Private, medical detachment, 6th Engineers, 3d Division.
He advanced in the attack with the company to which he was attached and worked constantly under heavy machine-gun and rifle fire searching for wounded and superintending their evacuation. While engaged in this work in the open under machine-gun fire, he was killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Anna Teiseth.
- Second lieutenant, 2d Antiaircraft Machine Gun Battalion.
He was leading a patrol to reconnoiter a position for antiaircraft machine guns when his group became scattered by intense shellfire. Upon returning to the shell-swept area to look for his patrol he found 1 of the men severely wounded. Making 2 trips through the heavy shellfire he secured the assistance of Private Laurel B. Heath and carried the wounded soldier to safety.
- Private, Company I, 312th Infantry, 78th Division.
After his platoon had reached its objective and was forced to retire under perilous machine-gun fire, Private Temple and 2 companions were surrounded by the enemy. His companions were wounded, but he bravely held off the enemy, after which he assisted both his companions to a first-aid station.
- Second lieutenant, 122d Field Artillery, 33d Division.
After telephone communications had been destroyed and his runners scattered on other missions, Lieutenant Templeton started on a mission of extreme importance from the Infantry to the Artillery. His path lay through a heavy machine-gun and shell fire, and before he reached his destination he was seriously wounded. He succeeded, however, in relaying his message to its destination.
- Second lieutenant, pilot, 96th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While engaged on a voluntary bombing mission he was attacked by 7 enemy planes (Fokker type). Although seriously wounded, he maneuvered his plane so skillfully that his observer was able to drive off the enemy planes. In the combat his plane was struck by 25 enemy bullets, some of which exploded the magazines of the observer's guns. In spite of his wounds and the damage to his machine he succeeded in landing safely on a strange field.
- Hospital apprentice, first class, U. S. Navy, attached to 49th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Disregarding his own safety, he voluntarily accompanied a small force into action, rendering most valuable treatment to the wounded until killed by a fragment of a shell.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Samuel W. Tenley.
- Corporal, Company B, 115th Infantry, 29th Division.
In several advances during this period Corporal Tennyson led his squad in attacks on machine-gun nests with conspicuous gallantry, always disregarding his own safety and encouraging his men both by words and actions. On Oct. 24, while leading his squad in an attack on a machine-gun nest, he was instantly killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Gertrude Tennyson.
- Sergeant, Company C, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
He had just captured and was taking to his platoon commander a German captain, when fire was opened on his platoon from 3 concealed machine guns. Showing great bravery and presence of mind, Sergeant Ternig, who speaks German, ran toward the enemy emplacements, taking his prisoner with him, and called upon the crews to cease firing. Firing stopped and his platoon was enabled to take the enemy position and 30 prisoners without loss.
- Second lieutenant, 151st Field Artillery, 42d Division.
He showed unusual courage in assisting to direct the operations of Battery C, 151st Field Artillery, near Pexonne, France, on Mar. 5, 1918, when that organization was under particularly accurate artillery bombardment. Although wounded himself, he refused first aid and continued on duty until all of the wounded soldiers of the command had been treated.
- Corporal, Company I, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
During an advance, when his company came under an enflading fire from an enemy machine gun, he asked permission from his platoon commander to attempt the taking of the position. Although under heavy fire from this post and from trench-mortar shells, he, with exceptional dash and bravery, attacked the position alone, putting it out of action, killing 2 of the enemy and wounding a third. This soldier was killed the same day while reorganizing and advancing the weakened platoon of which he was then in charge.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Clarence Terrell.

 A bronze oak leaf is awarded Major Thaw for extraordinary heroism in action near Montaigne, France, Apr. 20, 1918. In the region of Montaigne he attacked and brought down, burning, an enemy balloon. While returning to his own lines the same day, he attacked 2 enemy monoplanes, 1 of which he shot down in flames.
- First lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
 After having been wounded he remained with his company until its objective had been reached, refusing evacuation until rendered unconscious by loss of blood.
- Captain, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
 After the successful attack on Hill 253, Captain Thebaud was directed to establish liaison with the 30th Infantry. Three runners were sent out, but each returned, stating that it was impossible to reach the 30th Infantry, due to the intensity of enemy fire. Captain Thebaud turned over the command of his company and fearlessly exposed himself to heavy machine-gun fire to accomplish the mission. After having proceeded about 300 yards he fell, severely wounded by machine-gun fire. His conduct had a marked effect upon the morale of his men.

- Second lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
While endeavoring to reestablish a large company front which had become disconnected, Lieutenant Thomas encountered a large number of the enemy filtering through our lines. By strategic maneuvers he formed a strong resistance, causing heavy casualties on the enemy and forcing their retreat after he himself had been seriously wounded.
Oak-leaf cluster.
Lieutenant Thomas is also awarded an oak-leaf cluster for the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Chateau-Thierry, France, June 25, 1918: He commanded the left flank platoon of his company, which was subjected to heavy fire from enemy machine guns and trench mortars. When further advance in the face of the fire became impossible, he went forward alone, located the machine-gun positions, and then organized a flank attack on the emplacements, putting out of action 4 guns, 1 of which he himself captured. In this exploit his command suffered 40 per cent casualties and captured 21 prisoners. Reforming the remnants of his platoon, he moved forward through the enemy's barrage and to his objective, which he consolidated and held in the face of 3 counterattacks in 5 hours.

- Gunnery sergeant, 45th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
 Killed in action at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Catherine Todd Blaney.
- Private, Company K, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.
 After 10 others had been killed or wounded in an attempt to deliver a message, Private Todor carried an important message through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire and returned with a receipt showing the message had been delivered.
- Second Lieutenant, 104th Infantry, 26th Division.
 When the advance of his platoon was checked by enemy machine-gun fire he crawled forward alone to a position from which he could fire and killed 3 of the machine-gun crew, after which, with his platoon, he captured the gun and turned it on the foe.
- Private, Company I, 353d Infantry, 89th Division.
 When volunteers were called for to maintain liaison with the assault battalion, during heavy counterbattery by the enemy, he volunteered and within 2 hours successfully carried out 4 such missions.
- Sergeant, Company G, 6th Infantry, 2d Division.
 Facing heavy machine-gun fire, he alone charged a machine gun which was causing his company many casualties, killed the gunner, and captured the gun.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Daisy Tomlin.
- Mechanic, Company H, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
 During the attack on Vaux, Mechanic Tomlinson received a rifle-ball wound in the right knee. Although suffering great pain, he made no mention of his wound. Later during the attack he assisted in the capture of 2 officers and 5 men. During the 9 days that his company continued on duty in the front line Mechanic Tomlinson carried numerous messages to front-line platoons while exposed to heavy artillery and machine-gun fire.
- Private, first class, Company M, 27th Infantry.
 When his platoon was checked in the night by an armored train, he, without thought of his own danger, attempted to board the armored train and was fired upon, wounded, and fell under the wheels of the car, which severed his leg from his body.
- Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
 Sergeant Tompkins, while leading his machine-gun section in an attack, exposed himself to heavy artillery and machine-gun fire and alone advanced in front of our lines in order to select machine-gun positions. Later he was mortally wounded while exposing himself in order to direct his men to cover.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, E. G. Tompkins.
- Sergeant, Company L, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.
 In the face of heavy machine-gun and grenade fire he went forward, with 3 other soldiers, and brought back 5 seriously wounded men to a point where they could be given first-aid treatment. With utter disregard for his personal safety, he displayed courage, coolness, and good judgment in effecting the rescue.
- Private, Company M, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
 After having been painfully wounded by shrapnel he refused to go the rear for treatment, but remained at his post until fatally wounded by another shell.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Mathew Tonks.
- Private, Company K, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
 During the night he made frequent trips with wounded back through a heavily shelled area, setting an example of fearlessness to his comrades. The next day in an advance he carried a stretcher with the front wave, and when the objective was reached went from shell hole to shell hole, under intense enemy fire, giving first aid to the wounded and carrying them to the rear.
- Private, Battery C, 101st Field Artillery, 26th Division.
 He acted as a runner for the artillery liaison officer and after this officer was returned, wounded, voluntarily remained for 24 hours, acting as a runner for the Infantry, constantly passing through the most intense artillery and machine-gun fire.
- Chief pharmacist's mate, U. S. Navy, attached to the 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
 With no regard for his own safety, he labored unceasingly in caring for and evacuating the wounded under constant shellfire. His great activity and courage saved the lives of many of his comrades.

- Private, Company C, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
He displayed unusual daring and courage during the Seicheprey engagement on the morning of Apr. 20, 1918, when, under heavy artillery fire, he climbed out of his trench in the front line onto the top and killed a sniper who was pouring a destructive fire into our trenches.
- Private, Company I, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.
Private Tubbs accompanied Lieutenant Murphy and 3 other soldiers in a flank attack on 3 heavy machine guns. Fired on directly at 30 yards, they charged the guns, and in the hand-to-hand fight which followed this soldier and 2 of his comrades were killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Howard Homer Tubbs.
- Private, Company K, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
Private Tucker bravely volunteered to carry an important message to the battalion commander at a critical juncture, and in attempting to pass through a terrific enemy barrage was instantly killed by shellfire.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Sallie N. Tucker.
- Sergeant, Company L, 328th Infantry, 82d Division.
While being carried unconscious to a dressing station after having been wounded, he regained consciousness, arose from the stretcher, and rejoined his company. Shortly after, a gas shell exploded in a dugout where he and other men were taking cover. Although badly gassed, he again refused evacuation, remaining on duty with the company until it was relieved 16 days later.
- First lieutenant, chaplain, 105th Infantry, 27th Division.
During the operations against the Hindenburg line he displayed remarkable devotion to duty and courage in caring for the wounded under heavy shell and machine-gun fire. The splendid example set by this officer was an inspiration to the combat troops.
- Private, Company C, 12th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division.
Engaged as runner, he made repeated trips through intense shelling and machine-gun fire. On July 18 he was gassed, but bravely continued with his heroic work until he fell exhausted on the 20th.
- Private, Company D, 318th Infantry, 80th Division.
Private Tufin volunteered for dangerous outpost service within the enemy line. He worked his way behind enemy machine guns; was wounded, but refused to leave his post; and by the skillful use of his automatic rifle assisted in driving the enemy from their entrenched positions. He refused to leave his post until the battalion was relieved.
- Second lieutenant, 3d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division.
During the engagement near Soissons, France, July 18 and 19, 1918, the leadership of his platoon was exceptionally distinctive by reason of his courage, initiative, and presence of mind. While advancing on the second day of the attack he was wounded, but continued with his command until he had given complete instructions to his platoon sergeant and notified his company commander of the disposition of his guns, after which he was compelled to yield command because of weakness from his injuries.
- Private, first class, 337th Ambulance Company, 310th Sanitary Train, 85th Division (detachment in North Russia).
Private, first class, Tuley went forward some 200 yards in front of our lines into an area swept by artillery and machine-gun fire to assist in bringing a wounded man to a place of safety.
- First lieutenant, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.
On the morning of Nov. 1 Lieutenant Tune personally led an attack against an enemy machine-gun nest, killing 1 of the enemy, wounding 1, and taking 4 prisoners. On Nov. 6 he went far in advance of his company and with 2 other men killed a sniper in a building in the village of Marvaux. On Nov. 10 he led the remnants of his company in clearing the Bois-de-Juigny of enemy detachments. In this action Lieutenant Tune killed 1 of the enemy with a rifle and assisted in the capture of 5 prisoners.
- Private, Company I, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
Attempting to bring to shelter his captain, who was lying wounded and exposed to fire near Vaux, France, July 1, 1918, he was himself killed, thereby sacrificing his life in an effort to rescue his commanding officer.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Santo Turano.
- Private, first class, Company E, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
Private Turbeville, a battalion runner, displayed exceptional courage and disregard for personal danger in making 3 trips with important messages through heavy enemy machine-gun and shell fire.

- Corporal, 308th Trench Mortar Battery, 158th Field Artillery Brigade, 83d Division.
During the offensive operations in the Bossois Bois, Corporal Turkopp, although wounded by shellfire and knocked down by concussion, returned to his gun and continued to fire. So great was his exhaustion that it was necessary for him to be supported while doing his work.
- Corporal, Company I, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
In an attack by his company Corporal Turley gave proof of unusual gallantry and courage by fearlessly going out under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire to give aid to and carry back the wounded. He was himself seriously wounded while engaged in this work.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to stepmother, Mrs. Myrtle Turley.
- First lieutenant, 112th Infantry, 28th Division.
When the enemy attack, preceded by a very heavy barrage, had broken through and forced a retirement over the Vesle, Lieutenant Turner, himself wounded and under enemy fire from front and flanks, directed the retirement of his men, while he alone covered their withdrawal over the river with an automatic rifle, crossing after the last man was safely over.
- First lieutenant, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
Surrounded by enemy machine guns and snipers and under heavy shellfire, he refused to surrender, but held his position with extraordinary heroism and total disregard for his own life until he and all his detachment were killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Josephine Turner.
- First lieutenant, 308th Infantry, 4th Division.
Although completely surrounded and his ammunition exhausted, Lieutenant Turner refused to surrender. Assembling his platoon of about 18 men, he made a dash for our lines through the enemy's machine-gun and rifle fire, and, by taking advantage of all available cover and using grenades and ammunition found on the way, succeeded in joining our troops.
- Sergeant, Company B, 10th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division.
Sergeant Turner, a runner, repeatedly went out under shell and machine-gun fire to maintain liaison between units, frequently volunteering for especially hazardous missions. After other runners had been killed he rendered valuable service by repeatedly crossing dangerous areas in order to maintain communications.
- First lieutenant, 318th Infantry, 80th Division.
After having been severely wounded during the night of Nov. 2, 1918, he continued in command of his company. Despite his wound, he led his company in the attack the following day, when he was killed by an enemy shell. He set an example of fearlessness and bravery to his men.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. James A. Turner.
- Sergeant, Company D, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
Sergeant Turner volunteered and carried an automatic rifle to an advantageous position far in advance of his own line and maintained an effective fire on the enemy until his gun was put out of action and he was wounded in both hands and forced to retire. Before going to the rear he gave full and valuable information regarding the enemy's position to his officers.
- Private, Company M, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
When his platoon was held up by an enemy machine-gun post, Private Turner with another soldier took their automatic rifle, rushed 50 yards through intense fire, skillfully placed the rifle in position, and opened an effective fire.
- Private, 101st Ambulance Company, 101st Sanitary Train, 26th Division.
Under intense bombardment, he volunteered to go forward with a sergeant to rescue a number of seriously wounded soldiers. While they were engaged in this heroic work he was wounded and his companion killed by an exploding shell. After receiving first aid he immediately resumed his duties and remained at the front until the advanced station was closed.
- Private, Company C, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
After his platoon sergeant and a corporal had been shot while firing an automatic rifle, he ran forward across an open space and picked up the gun, but was instantly killed by sniper fire while attempting to get the automatic gun back into action.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. J. P. Shaw.
- Major, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He displayed extraordinary heroism and set a splendid example in fearlessly leading his command under heavy fire against superior odds. Because of his bravery and initiative every possible advantage in the attack was obtained.

His regiment having suffered heavy casualties in its first attack on July 18, 1918, and he having received orders to attack a second time, Colonel Upton reformed his command and conducted the second attack in person until stopped by darkness. His line being broken by a gap in its center, all of his battalion commanders being killed or wounded, and all of his reserves being in the thinly held line, he established his command post on the extreme front at the right of the gap and remained there for 24 hours under steady and intense artillery bombardment and machine-gun fire, holding his position until his regiment was relieved. His presence and his example of fearlessness inspired his weakened line thus to guard the unprotected flank of the whole advance and beat off a violent counterattack.

- First lieutenant, pilot, 95th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Lieutenant Vail while on patrol engaged 4 hostile pursuit planes which were about to attack an accompanying plane. Almost immediately he was attacked by 5 more enemy planes, all of which he continued to fight until he was severely wounded and his plane disabled. He glided to the ground, abandoning the fight only when his machine fell to pieces near the ground.

- Captain, 311th Infantry, 78th Division.
As adjutant of the 3d Battalion he volunteered and personally reconnoitered under fire the temporary front-line positions of his battalion for location and ammunition supply, when he returned to the command post and collected materials and all available men to carry them forward preparatory to the jump off early the next morning. Finding that there were not enough men to carry the needed supplies, Captain Vrooman loaded a wheelbarrow with ammunition and personally wheeled it 3 kilometers under fire to the firing line, where he supervised its distribution. At "H" hour, observing a company in need of assistance he attached himself to it and went over the top to the objective. After the position was consolidated, and knowing the importance of executing liaison between the attacking troops and those in Grand Pre, he went to that town and brought to the battalion command post definite information that our lines had been joined up.
- Major, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
During the attack by his battalion near Chateau-Thierry Major Waddill displayed exceptional bravery by advancing in the open under intense shell and machine-gun fire, reorganizing his leading echelons and pressing the attack with the utmost disregard for personal danger. On June 25 he went among his troops during a heavy gas attack, disregarding his own danger in order to protect his men, remaining in the sector and refusing to be evacuated until he had been so badly burned by gas that his face was black. In the Soissons-Reims attack he again displayed marked courage and leadership in personally taking the lead with his battalion and pushing forward the attack until further advance was stopped by darkness.
- Sergeant, Company H, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
He was severely wounded in the attack on the Cote-de-Chatillon, but he refused to be evacuated and remained with his platoon under heavy fire, reorganizing it for the counterattack for which the enemy were forming, thereby setting to his men an inspiring example of utter disregard for danger and heroism in the face of the enemy.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Thomas M. Wadsworth.
- Sergeant, 314th Ambulance Company, 304th Sanitary Train, 79th Division.
He heard a cry for help while in a dugout having his own wounds dressed. Although it was during particularly heavy shellfire, he immediately went outside and carried the wounded man to shelter. Later that day, when the dressing station caught fire, he made his way into the burning dressing station under heavy shellfire and secured surgical equipment necessary to save a patient's life.
- Sergeant, Company C, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
He was found badly wounded in the neck and legs, crawling back to bring up support to his position.
- Corporal, Company I, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
When concentrated machine-gun fire was encountered, he maneuvered his squad to a point near the nests, and, although severely wounded, continued to direct his men in silencing the guns.
- Private, Company M, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
Private Wagner, with 3 other soldiers, volunteered to carry wounded men of other companies from in front of our advanced positions, and carried this work on under violent machine-gun fire while a counterattack was developing.
- Private, Company C, 353d Infantry, 89th Division.
After being severely wounded in the hand and face, he continued his duties as stretcher bearer, carrying wounded from the field during the entire afternoon and evening. For 7 days thereafter he remained constantly on duty and during the entire period he worked under an almost incessant rain of shells.
- Private, first class, Headquarters Company, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
Exposing himself to heavy shellfire, he kept in repair the telephone wire to the front line, succeeding in his mission despite the fact that shellfire was causing repeated breaks while he was thus engaged.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, G. A. Waite.
- Private, first class, sanitary detachment, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.
Facing heavy machine-gun fire, he volunteered to go out and administer first aid to wounded soldiers lying on an open field, saving the lives of 5 men and alleviating the suffering of many others. After dark he continued his work until all the wounded had been removed to the rear and their wounds dressed.
- First lieutenant, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
Although shot through the arm, Lieutenant Waite with his company charged a machine-gun nest. His attempt being unsuccessful, he reformed his company and again attacked, this time silencing the nest and capturing it.

- Major, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
 Holding a front of more than 4½ kilometers along the Marne River, Major Walker commanded a front-line battalion, which received the principal shock of the German attack on the French Army Corps front, but inflicted great losses on the enemy as the latter crossed the river. Those who succeeded in crossing were thrown into such confusion that they were unable to follow the barrage; and, through the effective leadership of this officer, no Germans remained in his sector south of the river at the end of the day's action. When 1 platoon had been cut off by an entire enemy battalion near the river, he sent other units to its relief and captured the entire German battalion, numbering 200 soldiers and 5 officers, including the battalion commander.

After 12 hours of hard fighting, when Private Wall's platoon had gained its objective, the water taken forward in canteens had become exhausted, and the men were suffering from thirst. Knowing that the chances were against anyone being able to cross the shell-swept territory for water, the platoon commander called for volunteers. Private Wall responded, and, collecting the canteens of his comrades, departed on his precarious mission. Several hours later he returned, utterly exhausted, but bearing with him the canteens filled with precious water. Other men attempting to make similar trips in the same vicinity were either killed or wounded.

- Sergeant, Company A, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
Taking command of the company after all officers had become casualties, he reorganized it and led it under hostile shelling and withering machine-gun fire to its objective. He remained in command until painfully wounded on the following day.
- Corporal, Company A, 354th Infantry, 89th Division.
After his company had reached its objective and was being subjected to severe fire from an enemy machine-gun nest, he led his combat group of 3 men around the right flank of the company and, under heavy fire, charged the enemy position, capturing 3 guns and 13 prisoners.
- Sergeant, Company C, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
After his platoon leader had been wounded, Sergeant Ward reorganized the platoon under heavy fire and led it to its objective. He then led forward a patrol to locate the enemy positions, during which reconnaissance he was wounded by a machine-gun bullet. The ball lodged above the right eye. After receiving first aid he returned to his unit for duty. During a subsequent attack in the Argonne he was again wounded.
- First lieutenant, chaplain, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.
During the operations against the Hindenburg line he voluntarily and at great risk to himself went forward under heavy shell and machine-gun fire to care for the wounded and to search for the dead. Twice he was ordered off the field of battle by officers, being told each time that it was sure death to remain. During the entire time his regiment was engaged he remained on the field under fire, displaying a fine example of bravery and courage which was an inspiration to all.
- Private, medical detachment, 314th Infantry, 79th Division.
Under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, Private Ward waded through a swamp, administered first aid to a wounded soldier, and then carried the latter to safety.
- Private, Company F, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.
During the operations against the enemy lines east of Ronssoy he went out under heavy shell and machine-gun fire and succeeded in bandaging and bringing back to our line wounded soldiers.
- First lieutenant, 106th Infantry, 27th Division.
Severely wounded by enemy fire, he learned that an officer of his company, Lieutenant Boulee, was seriously wounded and lying in a shell hole some distance away. Dragging himself to the side of Lieutenant Boulee, he laboriously rendered first aid to the latter, who could not be moved on account of his wounded condition. Refusing to be evacuated to hospital, Lieutenant Ward chose to remain with his brother officer. The enemy having recaptured the territory in which the wounded officers were lying, the American officers remained concealed in their place of comparative shelter for 48 hours, when the enemy was repulsed and the ground regained, when the wounded men were sent to the rear.
- First sergeant, Company M, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.
Although severely wounded, Sergeant Ward assumed command of his company after the company commander had become a casualty, displaying great gallantry and bravery in leading them into action. While endeavoring to locate enemy machine-gun nests, he was killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, William H. Ward, sr.
- Sergeant, 49th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Under heavy machine-gun fire, he attempted to establish liaison with an adjoining French unit, during which he was killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to aunt, Mrs. Libby Riley.
- Captain, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
His company having been repulsed in an attack on a strongly organized position, Captain Ware reformed his company and personally led the 63 remaining members of company in a second attack and in the taking of the enemy position at the point of the bayonet. He then, under heavy fire, prepared the position for defense against enemy assault.
- Sergeant, Company B, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.
He displayed exceptional courage and loyalty by remaining in active command of his section after being wounded twice.
- First lieutenant, 370th Infantry, 93d Division.
Although separated with his platoon from the company, he continued to lead a stubborn resistance against enemy machine-gun nests, successfully capturing a gun and killing the crew. After having been severely wounded, he still continued in command, refusing relief until his objective was reached.

- Private, Company A, 11th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division.
As a runner between company and battalion headquarters he crossed heavily shelled areas to deliver important messages. Wounded when crossing an open space, subjected to artillery and machine-gun fire, he refused to be evacuated, but continued the performance of his duties.
- Captain, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
In the Bois-de-Belleau when all the officers of his company had become casualties he displayed marked heroism in leading his men forward in the face of heavy machine-gun fire, assisting in the capture of many machine guns. Near Vierzy he fearlessly exposed himself to enemy machine-gun and artillery fire, directing personally the reduction of strong points. He was killed at the head of his men while leading an advance.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, L. A. Wass.
- Private, first class, Company II, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
Showing utter disregard for personal danger, he advanced under heavy fire 200 yards farther into the woods than the rest of his platoon, captured 26 prisoners, and brought them back to our lines.
- Corporal, Headquarters Company, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
After participating in the action throughout the day and after seeing that his men had shelter for the night, he voluntarily exposed himself to care for the wounded who were lying out in the open.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John Waters.
- Corporal, Company C, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
Showing utter disregard for personal danger he advanced alone in the face of heavy fire for 100 yards in advance of our lines to attack a machine-gun emplacement, the fire from which was causing heavy casualties. He killed the 2 men at the enemy gun, permitting a renewal of the advance of his company.
- Second lieutenant, 107th Field Artillery, 28th Division.
He voluntarily went to the assistance of a large number of wounded soldiers who were in an exposed position waiting aid and continued for several hours to dress their wounds throughout a severe bombardment of gas and high-explosive shells, while hostile airplanes flew low and swept with machine-gun fire the line of litters bearing the wounded. After administering aid to 36 wounded men he helped carry them to a place of safety.
- Private, Company K, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.
While acting as runner between battalion and regimental headquarters he received severe wounds, but continued on with his mission to his destination, which was reached just before he died. After being wounded he covered a distance of approximately 300 meters to deliver his message.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Miss Harriet Jane Watkins.
- Sergeant, Company D, 135th Machine Gun Battalion, 37th Division.
After being twice wounded, Sergeant Watkins continued to lead his section in action against the enemy under severe machine-gun and direct artillery fire. Though he had been ordered to the rear by his platoon commander, he returned to his section as soon as his wounds had been dressed.
- Second lieutenant, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
During the storming of the heights north of the River Oureq, near Villers-sur-Fere, France, July 23, 1918, he was an example of courage and soldiery fortitude. He was continually with the foremost elements of his platoon in the most dangerous areas it had to occupy, both during the advance and during the maintenance of the position gained. His platoon was almost annihilated and he himself was killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Francis Watkins.
- Major, 326th Infantry, 82d Division.
On the night of Oct. 11 Major Watkins led his battalion under heavy shellfire, forded the Aire River, and took up an important position protecting a flank. On Oct. 14 and 15 he advanced against strongly held enemy positions, penetrating and capturing numerous prisoners and machine guns. He was wounded on both days, but he continued on duty until Oct. 17, suffering intense pain, until he was ordered to the rear. His fortitude and bravery furnished an inspiring example to his men.
- Private, first class, Company A, 350th Machine Gun Battalion, 92d Division.
He accompanied an Infantry patrol, acting as gunner with a heavy machine gun. When a large party of the enemy had worked around the flank of the patrol and was advancing across a road along which the patrol was withdrawing, he went into action with his gun at a range of less than 100 yards, although the order to withdraw had been given. Displaying exceptional coolness and bravery under heavy rifle and machine-gun fire, he succeeded in dispersing the enemy. He was the last of the patrol to retire.

- Second lieutenant, 2d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division.
 When the attack was held up by heavy machine-gun fire, he volunteered for the mission and led a platoon of Infantry, reinforced by 4 machine guns, into Exermont. In spite of desperate resistance, he led the attack through the streets, capturing many prisoners and learning from 1 of these the approximate location of machine guns on heights to the north led the 3 remaining members of the command against these. Within 50 yards of the enemy emplacements 1 of his men was killed and Lieutenant Wells was mortally wounded, but he had succeeded in indicating to those in the rear the location of the hostile positions.
 Oak-leaf cluster.
 Lieutenant Wells was awarded an oak-leaf cluster for the following act of extraordinary heroism near Buzancy, France, July 21, 1918: When the advancing lines were checked by the fire of numerous enemy machine guns, Lieutenant Wells skillfully directed the placing of one of his machine guns and silenced the hostile guns. While the line was being consolidated this officer, with another, reconnoitered beyond the left flank, which was being swept by enflading fire. Locating a German machine gun, he put it out of action by well-aimed shots from a rifle which he was then carrying. He then pushed on farther, accompanied by a soldier, captured a prisoner and discovered a nest of 8 enemy machine guns located in a trench, whereupon with great daring he brought up a section of guns and opened up an annihilating fire which dispersed the enemy with many casualties.

Sergeant Wendell with other men entered a cave occupied by a desperate enemy and in the face of a heavy fire, with utter disregard for his personal safety, aided in forcing the outlaws to abandon their stronghold, which resulted in their destruction by our forces.
- Private, Company K, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
He went forward ahead of his company against a machine gun that was checking the advance, killed the crew, and captured the gun.
- Private, medical detachment, 151st Field Artillery, 42d Division.
He displayed the highest bravery and self-sacrificing spirit by voluntarily leaving shelter during a heavy hostile bombardment and going to the assistance of several wounded men of another regiment whose position adjoined that of his own organization. Under terrific shellfire he skillfully dressed their wounds and then removed them to a place of safety, thereby saving their lives. Again returning to the shell-swept street, he made a careful reconnaissance for any other casualties which might have been overlooked.
- Sergeant, 43d Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Killed in action at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Amil Werner.
- Corporal, Company H, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.
With 2 other soldiers Corporal Werner volunteered to crawl out under enemy machine-gun fire in an effort to locate 3 members of the platoon who were missing after an unsuccessful attack on enemy machine-gun nests. Finding the body of 1, they located another, who lay helplessly wounded, by calling out his name. As a result they drew increased fire from the enemy but they courageously crawled 25 yards farther toward the hostile positions and succeeded in carrying back the wounded man through the machine-gun fire to our lines.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Susama Werner.
- Private, Troop C, 2d Cavalry, attached to Company G, 311th Infantry, 78th Division.
Becoming separated from his own organization he attached himself to an Infantry company. While on a patrol he was wounded 3 times. After the party had been surrounded by German machine guns, he volunteered to carry a message to the company commander, wading across the Aire River in so doing. After guiding a platoon to the relief of the patrol he again made several trips to and from the company post of command, crossing through the river waist deep 5 times after being wounded. He was sent to the rear against his vigorous protests, and after being tagged for evacuation he gave further proof of his devotion to duty and unselfishness by helping carry another wounded soldier 3 miles on a stretcher.
- Sergeant, Company M, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.
Sergeant Wescott, as second in command, accompanied a small combat patrol, which successfully attacked an enemy trench held up by 30 of the enemy with machine guns, driving the enemy from the trench and inflicting many casualties. When the patrol leader was severely wounded Sergeant Wescott took command and immediately reorganized the patrol, holding the captured position, despite a severe harassing fire from the enemy until relief came.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Leslie D. Wescott.
- Private, Company K, 114th Infantry, 29th Division.
He performed his duties as a runner under heavy shellfire for 3 days and nights without rest, and when the relay stations between the battalion and regimental posts of command had been wiped out he continued to carry messages the entire distances between the two posts.
- Captain, Medical Corps, attached to 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
Captain Wesselhoeft went forward under heavy machine-gun fire to the aid of a wounded soldier. The fire was so heavy that they were compelled to remain in the shell hole until nightfall, when he brought the wounded man to our lines.
- Corporal, Company A, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
When his automatic squad had become lost from the platoon in a heavy smoke barrage, Corporal West advanced alone upon a machine-gun nest which was firing directly from the front, silenced the gun, and returned to our lines with 37 prisoners.

- Sergeant, Company B, 12th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division.
He displayed exceptional courage and leadership in leading the section forward and maintaining fire on the enemy from an advanced position in the wood, successfully covering the withdrawal of the Infantry to a more secure position. This gallant soldier was killed 2 days later while he was successfully directing his section in breaking up an enemy counterattack. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Allen B. West.
- Mechanic, Company M, 137th Infantry, 35th Division.
Seeing a comrade lying wounded in advance of four lines, he left a shell hole and, exposing himself to heavy machine-gun fire, went into the open gap, assisted by another soldier, carried the wounded man back to safety.
- Sergeant, 47th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He unselfishly exposed himself in an effort to bring down an enemy sniper who had wounded several members of his group and was himself killed while in the performance of this self-sacrificing act. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Henry West.
- Private, first class, Company L, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
With another soldier he volunteered to go out across an open space swept by heavy machine-gun fire for 150 yards to rescue 2 wounded soldiers. The mission was accomplished successfully.
- Sergeant, Company F, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
He was a member of a patrol of 5 men which, on March 4, 1918, near Ancerville, France, encountered an enemy patrol of 11 men, which it attacked and routed, taking 2 prisoners.
- Second lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He voluntarily led a reconnaissance patrol under difficult conditions and secured information necessary to an attack. Three days later, after the command of his company had devolved on him, he continued in action in spite of being severely wounded, leading his men to the objective and refusing to be evacuated until proper disposition had been made.
- Sergeant, Company F, 115th Infantry, 29th Division.
In the Bois-de-Consenvoye on Oct. 8, and in the Bois-de-la-Grande Montagne on Oct. 16, 1918, he ably led his platoon with extreme courage and gallantry and by his conduct inspired the men of his platoon to greater effort. This soldier led a detachment against a strongly protected enemy machine-gun nest and successfully took the position under heavy fire.
- Lieutenant colonel, 11th Infantry, 5th Division.
When his command was halted by heavy fire from an enemy position, strongly entrenched and supported by a large number of machine guns, he placed himself in front of his men and gallantly led them in person to a successful attack, thereby securing a foothold on the east bank of the Meuse and insuring the safe passage of additional troops. By his disregard for personal danger he set an inspiring example to his men and played a conspicuous rôle in gaining the heights on the east bank of the Meuse held by the enemy since 1914.
- Private, Headquarters Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
As a runner he displayed exceptional courage in volunteering to carry important messages over terrain constantly swept by machine-gun and shell fire.
- Second lieutenant, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
Undaunted he reconnoitered enemy machine-gun positions near Soissons, France, July 18-21, 1918. On July 19, 1918, with a small party he crossed an area swept by fire and demolished several machine-gun nests that were holding up the advance.
- Corporal, Company G, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
Undaunted by terrific machine-gun fire, Corporal Westfall went out into the open and rescued a British officer who had fallen wounded. Later, after 2 runners had been killed in trying to locate missing elements of his battalion, Corporal Westfall assumed this task and in performing it 4 times crossed a sunken road, which was continuously raked by enemy machine-gun fire.
- Sergeant, Company I, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.
Sergeant Weston charged an enemy machine gun which was inflicting heavy losses upon our troops and delaying the advance. He wounded the gunner and captured the gun, thereby enabling our advance to continue.

- First lieutenant, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
In command of a Stokes mortar detachment Lieutenant Westphal displayed marked coolness and leadership under intense enemy shellfire in so separating his guns as to stop the advance of the Germans and prevent their crossing the Marne.
- Private, first class, Company F, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
Private Wetzel, a company runner, repeatedly volunteered for missions so hazardous that no others would attempt them. At all hours of the day and night, over unknown ground, he carried numerous messages in the face of heavy machine-gun and shellfire.
- First sergeant, Company D, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
During an enemy counterattack Sergeant Whalen led a small group forward to a shell hole about 50 yards in front of his company position. Although wounded, he kept an automatic rifle in action. At this new position he assisted in breaking up the enemy attack.
- Sergeant, Company F, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
Advancing far ahead of his patrol, he encountered an enemy patrol which opened fire on him. Despite the fact that he had been severely wounded, he continued to combat the enemy, killing 1 and dispersing the others.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Wellmon P. Whaley.
- First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
During the attack on Aug. 1, 1918, he went forward with the first wave and established a dressing station in an advanced position to render immediate aid to the wounded. On Aug. 5, 1918, at St. Martin, after having been knocked down by the explosion of a shell and while under severe fire and machine-gun fire, he displayed exceptional coolness and devotion to duty in rendering surgical attention to others who had been wounded by the same shell.
- Corporal, Company G, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
During a heavy bombardment on the morning of Feb. 27, 1918, 1 of the hand grenades which were being distributed to the men of his company was dropped by accident. Corporal Wheaton, with extreme courage and self-sacrifice, ran to and picked up the grenade in an effort to cast it out of the danger area before it exploded. It exploded, however, before he could throw it away, and he was fatally wounded, dying shortly thereafter.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to aunt, Mrs. Ada S. Pen Eycke.
- Sergeant, Company B, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
During an intermittent barrage, lasting for 2 hours, he placed his men in the best shelter available, but himself remained in observation, refusing to take cover from terrific artillery fire. He was twice buried by exploding shells while succoring wounded.
- Ordnance sergeant, Salvage Squadron No. 1, Quartermaster Corps, American Expeditionary Forces.
For extraordinary heroism in connection with military operations against an armed enemy near Bezu-St. Germain, France, Sept. 7, 1918. When fire broke out in a wood where a salvage detachment was encamped, seriously endangering the lives of 200 men because of their proximity to a pile of salvaged German high-explosive 155-millimeter shells, he and Private Willie J. Walker voluntarily ran to the scene of the fire and attempted to extinguish the flames, fully aware of the grave danger to themselves. They fought the fire with blankets and sticks, but the fire quickly spread to the shells. Both men were killed by the explosion which followed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Clarence A. Wheeler.
- First lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He was conspicuous for his bravery in remaining in action, although twice wounded, refusing to be evacuated until wounded a third time and then endeavoring to return to his command.
- Captain, Medical Corps, attached to 313th Infantry, 79th Division.
Working in areas that were continually being swept by machine-gun, rifle, and shell fire, Captain Wheelock worked voluntarily and unceasingly, giving aid, food, and water to the wounded. Throughout the entire operations he showed utter disregard for his own safety, being knocked down many times by shell explosions. For 2 nights he worked as a stretcher bearer, carrying patients to places of safety after giving them medical attention during the day.
- Private, Company H, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.
He crossed the Vesle River in the face of enemy fire and rescued a drowning comrade in the deep, swift current of the stream.
- Second lieutenant, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
While advancing with this platoon, Lieutenant Whisenant, after he was so severely wounded that he was unable to continue, so encouraged and inspired his men that they won a decided victory and captured many men and guns.
His wound resulted in the loss of a leg.

- Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 145th Infantry, 37th Division.
Attached to the regimental intelligence section of the 145th Infantry, he, with several men of his section, accompanied the first attacking wave of the regiment on Sept. 26. Losing contact temporarily with the assaulting wave on account of a smoke barrage, he halted momentarily and upon resuming the advance encountered enemy machine-gun and sniper fire near a swale in the Bois-de-Montcaumon. Leaving his men in a place of safety, Sergeant Whitcomb discovered an enemy machine-gun nest which covered a bridge across the swale. He captured several unarmed enemy soldiers and an officer; the latter he forced to return to the machine-gun nest and to deliver to him the gun crews, a number of men, as well as several enemy snipers who had been inflicting heavy casualties upon his men; this action permitted the Infantry to advance without further heavy losses.

- Sergeant, Company D, 306th Machine Gun Battalion, 77th Division.
While in command of his platoon, Sergeant White went with 2 other soldiers to the rescue of 3 members of a gun crew among whom a German hand grenade had burst. Finding 1 of the men dead and another so severely wounded that he could not be moved, Sergeant White carried the third man to shelter, in plain view of the enemy under continuous shell and machine-gun fire. His 2 comrades also having been wounded, he also succeeded in getting them back to safety, and thereafter twice returned to the gun position to administer first aid and carry water to the wounded soldier who could not be moved.

R—New York, N. Y.
B—New Haven, Conn.
G. O. No. 71, W. D., 1919.
- Second lieutenant, pilot, 147th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While protecting 3 allied observation planes in the region of Etain, Lieutenant White was attacked by 3 Halberstadt fighters. He engaged them immediately, successfully fighting them off and leading them all away from the observation planes, which were thus permitted to carry on their work unmolested. While returning home he dived through a cloud to attack an enemy balloon near Chambley, bringing it down in flames. Two Fokker scouts then attacked him, and although he was alone, with intrepid courage he attacked the first Fokker head-on, shooting until it went down in a vertical dive out of control. Pulling sharply, he fired a long burst at the second Fokker as it went over him, putting it to immediate flight.
Oak-leaf cluster.
- For the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Toul, France, Oct. 10, 1918, Lieutenant White is awarded an oak-leaf cluster to be worn with his distinguished-service cross: In command of a patrol of 4 planes which was attacked by 5 German Fokkers, he attacked the enemy plane which was hard pressing a new pilot. The German Fokker had gotten at the tail of the American plane and was overtaking it. Lieutenant White's gun having jammed, he dove his plane head-on into the German Fokker, both crashing to earth, 500 meters below.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Dr. W. W. White.

 G. O. No. 9, W. D., 1923.
- Sergeant, Company A, 168th Infantry, 42d Division.
 While leading his platoon up the steep and strongly fortified slopes of Hill 288 under terrific machine-gun fire, with great dash and courage he charged and captured 3 machine-gun nests which had caused severe losses to his platoon. On 2 occasions he reorganized his platoon under heavy machine-gun fire, and while unflinchingly pressing his advantage in personally charging and putting out of action a fourth machine-gun emplacement he received the wound which caused his instant death.
 Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Henry Wilkinson.

- Private, first class, Headquarters Company 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
While acting as runner, Private Williams, badly wounded, concealed the fact when he realized that his services were badly needed. He ran and delivered messages throughout the attack, and not until the objectives were attained and consolidated would he allow his wound to be dressed.
- Sergeant, Company C, 301st Battalion, Tank Corps.
While operating against the enemy, his tank received a direct hit, killing or wounding the entire crew. Although severely wounded, Sergeant Williams assisted his tank commander, who was severely wounded and temporarily blinded, to a position of shelter in the sap of a near-by trench. He then returned to his tank and under heavy fire continued to operate a 6-pounder against the enemy until driven out by armor-piercing shells. He then assisted in the operation of a machine gun against heavy enemy fire from a trench that lay between them and our first line. When it became sufficiently dark, he aided his tank commander to a first-aid station. His courage and heroic actions throughout the day were largely responsible for saving the life of the officer commanding his tank.
- First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 168th Infantry, 42d Division.
He voluntarily left a dugout on the Champagne front and for more than 2 hours, all the time under shellfire, administered to the needs of wounded men who were lying in the open. During the advance across the River Ourcq he voluntarily remained in exposed positions under heavy shellfire, caring for and dressing the wounded, until he was severely injured.
- Captain, 325th Infantry, 82d Division.
During the operations in the vicinity of St. Juvin this officer demonstrated the highest personal bravery and leadership. On Oct. 12, although he was wounded, he organized a provisional combat group and led it to a ridge, repulsing an enemy counterattack which threatened our left flank. On Oct. 16, while he was reconnoitering a position for machine guns, he rescued an American soldier from 5 armed Germans, 4 of whom he killed with his pistol. Later on the same day he saw a hostile skirmish line advancing toward Hill 182. He rushed a machine gun forward, with which the attack was broken.
- Private, Company A, 24th Infantry, U. S. Army.
When the command of which he was a member was held up in the crossing of the Rio Grande de Cagayan by rifle fire from a well-intrenched enemy, and being without boats or rafts with which to cross, Private Williams with 5 other members of his company volunteered to swim the river. Displaying great gallantry and with utter disregard for his life, he swam the river in the face of heavy rifle fire, returned on a raft, secured arms and ammunition, crossed a second time, and took part in an attack which drove a superior force of the enemy from their trenches and the town occupied by them, thereby making possible the further advance of his company.
- First lieutenant, 76th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
In command of a detached piece operating with Infantry of the 5th Division Lieutenant Williams kept his gun close behind the attacking waves and skillfully accomplished the missions assigned to him. This was the first fieldpiece to cross the Meuse. Putting out of action a battery of German 77-millimeter guns by direct fire, he later turned them on the retreating enemy after his own ammunition had been exhausted.
- Second lieutenant, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
He led a patrol across the Marne River under intense machine-gun fire, and when his boat was sunk twice swam the river to correct the fire of his covering detachment and to bring his patrol to safety after their mission had been accomplished.
- Private, Company E, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.
With another soldier Private Williams volunteered and rescued a wounded comrade from an exposed position in front of the line after 2 other men had lost their lives in attempting to do so.
- Sergeant, Company F, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
When the platoon he commanded was enfiladed successively by 2 machine-gun nests, he disposed his men so that both nests were captured without casualties. He displayed marked personal heroism in the advance, killing 1 enemy gunner with the butt of his rifle and bayoneting a second. His example of fearlessness was an example that inspired his men.
- Private, Company E, 366th Infantry, 92d Division.
He was a member of a combat group which was attacked by 20 of an enemy raiding party advancing under a heavy barrage and using liquid. The sergeant in charge of the group was killed and several others, including Private Williams, were wounded. Nevertheless, this soldier with 3 others fearlessly resisted the enemy until they were driven off.

- First lieutenant, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
 With a party of 30 men he led the advance on the Bois Chenet, where a full company of Germans, supported by machine guns, were encountered. Due to his splendid leadership and example this resistance was overcome and the woods were taken. Although suffering great pain from a broken ear drum, caused by the explosion of a shell, Lieutenant Wilson immediately led his party to the flank of the battalion, where numerous attempts of the enemy to retake the woods were repulsed. He refused to leave his company for first aid until darkness had brought an end to the advance.

- Captain, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Captain Woodside rallied the men of one platoon of his company who were falling back in disorder, reformed them under heavy enemy shell and machine-gun fire, and led them to the left front of the battalion sector and engaged the attacking enemy. His prompt action stopped an enveloping movement of the enemy which imperiled the position of the battalion.
- Private, Company A, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
He left our lines on his own initiative and advancing along against a German machine-gun nest killed the crew and brought back their machine gun. He showed marked coolness and bravery, with utter disregard for the heavy fire to which he was subjected.
- Private, Company B, 112th Machine Gun Battalion, 29th Division.
He remained at his gun until the position was destroyed, the other gun sentry killed, and he himself wounded. He refused first aid until the bombardment had lifted and kept up the morale of the other members of his section by his heroism and cheerfulness.
- Captain, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
Advancing with his company in the face of withering machine-gun fire, he attacked a nest of 10 machine guns and a battery of field guns which were holding up the attack. In spite of the additional hazard of heavy enfilading fire from enemy artillery on the left, he succeeded with his mission. On another occasion he broke up an enemy counterattack formation by placing an automatic-rifle team in an exposed position and disorganized the enemy with a harassing fire.
- Private, Battery E, 42d Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps.
Acting as a runner during an engagement, he kept up his work throughout the bombardment. On the trip he was wounded by a bursting shell, but succeeded in carrying a very important message to his battery commander.
- First lieutenant, 319th Infantry, 80th Division.
Disregarding his intense suffering from wounds, he continued to lead and encourage his men until killed by another rain of machine-gun bullets. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Jeanne B. Woodward.
- Captain, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
With rare courage and conspicuous gallantry he led a counterattack against an enemy of 5 times his own numbers on July 15, 1918, east of Chateau-Thierry, France; 189 men entered this counterattack and 51 emerged untouched. More than 1,000 of the enemy were killed, wounded, or taken prisoners.
- Private, Company I, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
Volunteering to serve on a patrol for the purpose of capturing prisoners, Private Woolfe crawled forward to a sentry post 25 yards from the enemy lines. Overpowering 2 sentries, he started back under a heavy barrage of rifle grenades and rifle fire, and ignoring his great danger he successfully delivered his prisoners to the battalion commander.
- First lieutenant, 312th Infantry, 78th Division.
In the attack of morning of Oct. 18 Lieutenant Woolshlager was severely wounded, both legs being broken. He nevertheless retained command of his platoon and that of an adjoining platoon. Throughout the day, exposed to heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, he encouraged and directed his men. Due to his efforts the position, gained at great cost, was held against enemy attacks.
- Sergeant, Company M, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.
Leading a patrol to locate hidden machine-gun nests, Sergeant Woomer placed his men in advantageous positions and advanced alone to draw fire from the enemy strongholds. In the execution of his mission he was killed, but his heroic action saved the lives of many in the advance that followed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. William Line.
- First lieutenant, 151st Field Artillery, 42d Division.
During the action near Pexonne, France, on Mar. 5, 1918, he displayed unusual presence of mind and initiative by the effective manner in which he assisted in directing the operations of Battery C, 151st Field Artillery, when it was under particularly heavy bombardment.
- Wagoner, 21st Ambulance Company, 4th Sanitary Train, 4th Division.
While driving an ambulance through the town he heard cries for help. Voluntarily and under heavy shell and machine-gun fire, he climbed a tower, in which he found 2 officers and a corporal severely wounded. He rendered first aid and assisted in carrying the wounded men to a place of safety.

- Sergeant, Battery C, 124th Field Artillery, 33d Division.
 After 3 members of his gun crew had been wounded during heavy enemy shellfire he alone continued to keep his piece in action for 15 minutes until assistance reached him. He was wounded in action shortly afterwards.
- Corporal, Company L, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
 Accompanying an officer, he aided him in putting 2 enemy machine guns out of action. He then carried the information which they secured through a heavy machine-gun barrage to battalion headquarters. Later, when his platoon commander had been wounded, Corporal Wright took command and led the platoon until he was himself wounded.
- Private, Company K, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
 In the advance Private Wright and 2 comrades were cut off from the rest of the company by the enemy. He resisted stoutly until he fell with a rifle-shot wound through both legs and was taken prisoner. 2 days later, during the advance of our troops, he assisted in the capture of all the enemy in a dugout by calling to the troops and disclosing his position.
- Corporal, Company I, 130th Infantry, 35th Division.
 After being wounded in the knee, Corporal Wright refused to be evacuated but remained at his post for nearly 24 hours, until his wounds became so serious that he was ordered to the dressing station. His example of bravery and fortitude was an inspiration to his comrades.
- Private, Company K, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.
 Accompanying Second Lieut. Charles R. Hanger, Private Wright made 3 trips through heavy shellfire to locate 3 companies which had become lost in the dense fog during the crossing of the Meuse River and guided them to the river crossing.
- Corporal, Company C, 344th Battalion, Tank Corps.
 Entering the town of Nonsard during an extremely heavy barrage, Corporal Wright put out of action an enemy machine gun which was impeding the progress of our troops into the town. On Sept. 27, accompanied by another tank, Corporal Wright advanced far ahead of the Infantry and put to flight several enemy machine gunners. A counterattack by the enemy damaged his tank slightly, which forced him to withdraw to a supposed place of safety for repairs. Discovering his tank, the enemy shelled it, when both he and his companion were wounded and taken for treatment. He returned to his tank voluntarily and rendered most valiant service until killed Oct. 3. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Kathleen R. Wright.
- Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
 Under constant high-explosive and shrapnel fire, he remained exposed for 19 hours, observing the movements of the enemy, obtaining information of the utmost value.
- Captain, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.
 On Sept. 28, in order to save his men, he crossed a clearing under heavy machine gun fire to secure information of the troops on his flank. On Nov. 6 he set a splendid example to his men under heavy shellfire by going from shell hole to shell hole, encouraging them and directing them to safe places.
- Corporal, Company L, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
 He went through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, taking forward an automatic rifle to the front line to replace one which had become unserviceable, after seeing several other soldiers killed or wounded in a similar attempt.
- Sergeant, Company I, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
 After he had been severely wounded Sergeant Wright remained on duty through a heavy shell and gas bombardment, rendering valuable assistance to his platoon commander.
- Cook, Supply Company, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
 During the heaviest bombardment he regularly supplied hot meals to his men. On July 16 his kitchen was almost demolished by shell bursts and a large number of rations destroyed, but he remained at his post after all his assistants had sought places of safety.
- Second lieutenant, 102d Machine Gun Battalion, 26th Division.
 Wounded while conducting his platoon into position to lay a barrage for a raid, he showed complete disregard for his own safety by remaining on duty for more than an hour under heavy machine-gun and shell fire, directing the location and adjustment of his guns. After his wounds were dressed he returned to his platoon and remained with it until it was relieved.

Acting as flight leader of 5 airplanes he observed 15 or 20 enemy planes attacking a small number of allied planes. Lieutenant Wyly rushed to the assistance of the allied airmen and repeatedly attacked superior numbers of enemy planes. His machine was riddled by enemy fire and his gas tank perforated. Despite this fact, he continued to fight until his plane was shot down close behind our lines, but before landing had succeeded in scattering and driving off the enemy planes. On Sept. 17, northwest of Cambrai, he boldly attacked 5 enemy planes, shooting down 1 of the enemy. On Oct. 21 he volunteered to attack the enemy airdrome near Famors, outside of Valenciennes, many miles behind the enemy lines, despite the fog and mist on that day. In company with another pilot of the squadron he reached his destination to find the airdrome had the night before been evacuated. They continued on to Valenciennes, discovered an enemy transport column 2 miles in length. In spite of enemy machine-gun fire and almost impossible flying conditions, the column was attacked and great damage inflicted upon it. His machine badly crippled, he returned to his airdrome with extremely valuable information. |

- Second lieutenant, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
While digging in at his final objective, he came under fire from a hostile machine gun in a sunken road 200 yards to the right front. With Sergeant Kojano and 2 Australian soldiers, he rushed the position and captured the gun and 8 prisoners.
- Corporal, Company B, 306th Infantry, 77th Division.
He displayed exceptional bravery by volunteering to cut a strip of enemy barbed wire to make an opening for his company, which was at that time under heavy fire from artillery and machine guns. In performing this mission this soldier received wounds from which he afterwards died.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Louis Yamin.
- Private, Company I, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
Although severely wounded, he made his way through the terrific enemy barrage to his post in the trenches and remained on duty until ordered to the rear by his commanding officer.
- Private, first class, medical detachment, 13th Machine Gun Battalion, 5th Division.
Private Yannantuono voluntarily went forward and administered first aid to wounded Infantry soldiers under heavy shell and machine-gun fire in plain view of the enemy, being killed in the performance of this self-sacrificing mission.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Paul Yannantuono.
- First lieutenant, 363d Infantry, 91st Division.
Leading his platoon as a combat patrol 500 yards ahead of the front line under intense shell and machine-gun fire, he was wounded 3 times, but remained on duty for more than an hour until relieved. He then refused to leave until the new officer had been fully informed as to his disposition and that of the enemy.
- First lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He displayed exceptional bravery when his platoon was in a support position under intense artillery fire by moving from 1 shell hole to another in the open and steadying his men. After making 1 trip over his line he was wounded by an exploding shell, but refused aid until he saw that the wounded soldiers with him had been treated and taken to shelter. He later died of his wounds.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, G. H. Yarbrough, sr.
- Corporal, Company C, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
Corporal Yarnis volunteered for and attacked a machine-gun position which was enfilading the lines by its fire from the left flank. He killed the enemy crew, in which encounter he was wounded by a grenade. Notwithstanding his wound, he advanced against a second machine-gun position, during which he was wounded a second time. However, he continued on and attacked the enemy crew.
- Pharmacist's mate, third class, U. S. Navy, attached to 6th Machine Gun Battalion, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He attended the wounded during a heavy artillery and gas bombardment, remaining at his post even after his gas mask had been torn from his face by a shell fragment. Late in the day in a violent barrage of machine-gun fire he showed entire disregard for his own safety in ministering to wounded soldiers and in organizing 2 crews of litter bearers to carry them from the road to the dressing station.
- Private, Company L, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
Private Yeager, in an exposed position under a heavy machine-gun and artillery barrage, kept up an effective fire from his automatic rifle until severely wounded. After waiting 7 hours with a comrade for a stretcher and only 1 arrived, although practically unconscious he insisted on his comrade leaving first.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, James Yeager.
- Private, Company C, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
When other means of liaison were destroyed by heavy enemy fire, Private Yochim carried numerous messages over routes exposed to heavy artillery fire from units in line to battalion headquarters. In all subsequent engagements of this regiment he exposed himself fearlessly in order to maintain communication until severely wounded near Cunel, Oct. 21, 1918, while carrying a message over area swept by machine-gun fire.
- Private, Company E, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
Private Yockey voluntarily led 2 other men in an attack on a machine-gun nest which was delivering a withering fire on the company and delaying its advance. By the skill and bravery of this attack the enemy gunner was killed and the advancing company saved from a dangerous flanking fire.
- Sergeant, medical detachment, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
While directing the evacuation of the wounded, he was severely gassed, but refused to be evacuated and continued in charge of the dressing station to which he had been assigned. He displayed marked fortitude and personal bravery, working constantly to help the wounded.

D., 1920. | Second corporal (acting, sergeant), 468th North Midland Field Company, Royal Engineers (Territorial Force), 46th Division, British Army.Corporal Cameron was in charge of a party of sappers which advanced with the Infantry. He advanced through heavy fire and on several occasions showed contempt for danger in entering dugouts and tunnels which were suspected of being mined by the enemy. During the advance he attacked and captured an enemy machine gun and 6 men. This action took place in conjunction with the attack of the 30th U. S. Division.  |
| COLLISON, HERBERT L.-----Near Obozerskaya, Russia, Oct. 16, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 24, W. D., 1920.               | Captain, Royal Artillery, British Army.This officer acted as artillery observer in an advance against the enemy, which was continuous over several hours and at all times under very heavy artillery and machine-gun fire. He not only accompanied the advance troops, but at times went ahead of them, in order better to direct the fire of the American troops. At one time when, by a rapid advance of a portion of our troops, they were within the danger zone of our own fire, telephone communication having been cut, Captain Collison returned through the enemy barrage and taking a position in the open and under fire signaled a warning to our artillery. By this particularly brave and daring act the success of the American Infantry in this engagement was assured.  |
| DODWELL, THOMAS B.-----Near Bruges, Belgium, Aug. 13, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 44, W. D., 1919.                     | Second lieutenant, British Army, observer, Royal Air Forces, British Expeditionary Forces.This officer and his pilot led 2 other machines on a long photographic mission over the area north of Bruges. Over Thourout they were attacked by 6 enemy planes. While heavily engaged, Lieutenant Dodwell and his pilot saw 1 of their machines in difficulty and trying to make our lines with an enemy plane close at his tail. Regardless of their own danger from the remaining planes, they dived to the assistance of the crippled plane. Taking advantage of their preoccupation, several enemy planes attacked from the rear but in spite of this rear attack they drove off the enemy plane and allowed the damaged plane to land within our lines. Half of the tail plane was shot away, but Lieutenant Dodwell climbed along the wing and lay down along the cowl in front of the pilot, enabling the pilot to regain partial control of his machine. When nearing the ground he crawled back into the cockpit to allow the nose to rise, and the pilot made a safe landing. The presence of mind and cool courage of this officer saved the machine from crashing to the ground. |
| ERRINGTON, ARTHUR (91)-----Near Bellecourt, France, Sept. 29, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 68, W. D., 1920.             | Sergeant, 32d Battalion, 5th Division, Australian Imperial Force.When his company was halted by machine-gun fire, Sergeant Errington with 2 comrades rushed the enemy position and captured the machine gun. Later the same day he rushed a second machine gun, capturing the gun and killing 3 of the crew. This action took place in conjunction with the attack of the 30th U. S. Division.   |

| HILL, JOHN H.Northwest of Bony, France, Sept. 29, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 60, W. D., 1920.   | Lieutenant, 50th Battalion, 13th Infantry, Australian Imperial Force.While attached to a battalion of the 107th American Infantry, Lieutenant Hill exposed himself to heavy fire in order to mark out the jumping-off line. He assisted in forming the men for the attack and gallantly led them forward until he was severely wounded in the leg.   |
| HOWARTH, JAMES (29649)Near Kadish, Russia, Oct. 7, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 15, W. D., 1921.  | Sergeant, Liverpool Regiment, British Army.Sergeant Howarth gallantly led his platoon in 5 successive attacks upon a strongly fortified line of blockhouses. During the withdrawal he exposed himself to heavy fire in order to direct the fire of a Lewis gun crew in order to secure the safe evacuation of his wounded.   |
| KESSLER, ALBERT E. (15661)South of Bazuel, France, Oct. 23, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 60, W. D., 1920.                                 | Private, British Army, 11th Battalion, Essex Regiment, British Expeditionary Forces.Private Kessler delivered an important message to the units of the front lines. En route he was exposed to heavy enemy fire, but he continued until he had accomplished his mission. By his fearless conduct he enabled the companies to take up new positions without delay. This action took place when fighting alongside the American 27th Division.   |
| LITTLE, WILLIAM B.During the Ypres-Lys offensive, Oct. 17, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 60, W. D., 1920.                                  | Major, British Army, East Lancashire Regiment, attached to 6th Battalion, Royal Dublin Fusiliers, 198th Infantry, British Expeditionary Forces.During the Ypres-Lys offensive, Oct. 17, 1918, when closely affiliated with American troops. On one occasion, when Major Little was forming his battalion for the attack, the enemy put down a heavy barrage, inflicting many casualties. Regardless of the heavy enemy fire, this officer reassured his men and then gallantly led them in a successful attack. This action took place when fighting alongside the American 27th Division.   |
| MCMAMEE, JOHN T.Various dates and places in France.R—England.G. O. No. 126, W. D., 1919.Distinguished-service medal also awarded. | Captain, Royal Field Artillery, British Army, attached to 1st Battalion, 1st Gas Regiment, American Expeditionary Forces.Volunteering, he led a detachment of Engineers up to the front lines on July 30, 1918, for the purpose of assisting the advance of the Infantry with thermite and smoke bombs. That night he led his men through a heavy barrage, exhibiting courage and leadership. For 3 days and nights he remained with his men in the extreme front line in the Bois Colas, greatly aiding in repulsing enemy counterattacks by laying down barrages of thermite and phosphorus, cleaning out machine-gun nests in the same manner, and enabling our Infantry to attack behind smoke screens. On Aug. 5 he took another detachment into St. Thibaut and brought ammunition into the village before it was occupied by our Infantry and while the enemy patrols were still there. The advance of the Infantry across the 2 rivers, the Ourcq and the Vesle, was greatly facilitated and the lives of many of them saved by the smoke screens which Captain McNamee so successfully prepared. Throughout this entire advance across these 2 rivers he conducted himself with extraordinary heroism, setting an example to the men of the regiment to which he was attached, constantly exposing himself to danger in making reconnaissance and at the same time shielding his men. |
| MORISSET, VAUX L.At Nautroy, France, Sept. 29, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 68, W. D., 1920.  | Captain, 31st Battalion, 5th Division, Australian Imperial Force.During the advance following the capture of Bellicourt, Captain Morisset, acting battalion adjutant, observed that flanking troops had failed to advance, leaving a gap in the line. On his own initiative, he gathered several detachments of troops under heavy machine-gun fire and deployed them, covering the threatened gap. His prompt and courageous conduct contributed to the success of the operations in which the 30th U. S. Division was engaged.   |
| MUNDAY, WILLIAM T. J.Near Vierstraat, Belgium, Aug. 30 and 31, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 60, W. D., 1920.                              | Lieutenant, British Army, 112th Battery, 24th Brigade, Royal Field Artillery, British Expeditionary Forces.While in command of an accompanying gun, Lieutenant Munday advanced in close support of the attack of the 106th American Infantry. With a signaler, he made a daring reconnaissance in advance of our lines and returned with valuable information. In an encounter with an enemy patrol near Rossignol Wood 2 of the enemy were captured.  |
| PADGETT, JOHN R. (546)In the attack on the Hindenburg line, Sept. 29, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 60, W. D., 1920.                       | Lance-corporal, 44th Battalion, 11th Infantry, Australian Imperial Force.Corporal Padgett led his section in a successful attack on an enemy trench. When an enemy grenade fell amongst his section, he picked it up and threw it back toward the enemy. Later he exposed himself to heavy fire in order to carry an American soldier to a place of safety. This action took place when fighting alongside the American 27th Division.   |
| PARKES, THOMAS (2487)North of Bellicourt, France, Sept. 30, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 60, W. D., 1920.   | Captain, Liverpool Regiment, British Army.While moving forward in command of a support company, Captain Smyrden encountered a disorganized Russian company in full retreat. Quickly reorganizing 2 platoons of this force, and with his own company, he launched a successful counterattack which reestablished the firing line in the original position. He then launched a new attack, which drove the enemy into their line of blockhouses. The coolness and courage of this officer was a great inspiration to his men. |
| TREWARN, FREDERICK (2295)-----Near Bellicourt, France, Sept. 29,1918.R—England.G. O. No. 60, W. D., 1920.                         | Private, 5th Machine Gun Battalion, Australian Imperial Force.On 3 different occasions Private Trewarn exposed himself to artillery and machine-gun fire in order to assist wounded to shelter. Later on, when warning was received of an impending enemy counterattack, he displayed great coolness and good judgment under heavy fire in selecting positions for his guns. This action took place when fighting alongside the American 27th Division.   |
| UNDERWOOD, ALBERT T. (240721)-----During the attack on RiquervalWoods, France, Oct. 11, 1918.R—England.G. O. No. 68, W. D., 1920. | Lance-corporal, 5th Battalion, Leicestershire Regiment, Territorial Force, 46th Division, British Army.While acting as a platoon scout in advance of his platoon, Corporal Underwood suddenly encountered a post of 9 Germans. He fearlessly engaged them until his platoon arrived. His courageous action not only saved his platoon from being ambushed but enabled it to reach its objective with slight loss. This action took place in conjunction with the attack of the 30th U. S. Division.                         |

| *ANDRAL, LOUIS.....Near Dun-sur-Meuse, France, Oct. 30, 1918.R—France.G. O. No. 50, W. D., 1919.   | First lieutenant, observer, 284th Squadron, Air Service, French Army, attached to 3d Army, American Expeditionary Forces.Distinguishing himself by his constant bravery and brilliance as an observer, Lieutenant Andral rendered valiant service, flying at times under most hazardous conditions. Many times he returned from low-flying patrols with his machine riddled with bullets. He attacked and drove from its mission an enemy observation plane, and later attacked a patrol of 4 enemy planes. In the fight that ensued he proved unequal to such an adversary and was killed.Posthumously awarded. Medal forwarded to the French mission, General Headquarters, American Expeditionary Forces, for delivery to the next of kin. |
| ARMENGAUD, PAUL F. M.....Near St. Mihiel, France, Sept. 12-16, 1918.R—France.G. O. No. 120, W. D., 1918.Distinguished-service medal also awarded. | Major of Air Service, French Army, acting as Assistant Chief of Staff, Air Service, 1st Army, American Expeditionary Forces.Major Armengaud, acting as Assistant Chief of Staff, Air Service, 1st Army, did display great bravery much beyond that required by his position while acting as observer in an airplane. Each day of the battle in the St. Mihiel salient he flew over the hostile lines through our own and the enemy's artillery and machine-gun fire, observing the enemy air and ground activity and the disposition of our own air forces, thereby bringing back valuable information as to the enemy's dispositions and probable intentions, which materially aided in our subsequent operations.                                |
| ARTONI, CHARLES.....Near Massif Blanc Mont, France, Oct. 3-8, 1918.R—France.G. O. No. 126, W. D., 1919.  | Machine gunner, AS. 307, 3d Battalion of Light Tanks, Assault Artillery, French Army.During attacks by the 2d American Division he distinguished himself by volunteering twice for hazardous duty—first, to take food to the firing line, and later, to replace a wounded comrade as liaison agent. His personal courage and coolness under heavy fire were marked.  |
| ASCHLIMAN, PAUL.....Near Villers-Tournelle, France, May 3-4, 1918.R—France.G. O. No. 37, W. D., 1919.  | Sergeant, interpreter, Battalion of 19th Train of Military Transports, French Army, attached to 1st Infantry Brigade, 1st Division, American Expeditionary Forces.During a particularly intense bombardment of high-explosive and gas shells he went through the town notifying and warning troops of the presence of gas and directing various elements passing that point, his mission at all times exposing him to this heavy fire.   |
| BARDOU, HENRI.....Near Massif Blanc Mont, France, Oct. 8, 1918.R—France.G. O. No. 126, W. D., 1919.  | Brigadier, 308th Company, Tank Corps, 3d Battalion of Light Tanks, French Army.During an attack by the 2d American Division he displayed marked coolness and bravery in guiding his tank through heavy counterpreparation fire during an approach march. He never hesitated to leave the protection of the tank the better to direct its advance. Later he showed great personal courage in going through heavy shellfire to the rescue of several wounded American soldiers.  |
| BARRE, MARCEL.....Near Massif Blanc Mont, France, Oct. 3-8, 1918.R—France.G. O. No. 81, W. D., 1919.   | Private, 308th Company, Tank Corps, 3d Battalion of Light Tanks, Assault Artillery, French Army.During attacks by the 2d American Division he distinguished himself by coolness and courage in leading his tank in the approach march through heavy counterpreparation fire. He brought his tank into position with great skill and later displayed extraordinary personal heroism in going under heavy shellfire to the rescue of American wounded.   |
| BAURIN, ALBERT.....Near Gesnes, France, Oct. 4, 1918.R—France.G. O. No. 78, W. D., 1919.   | Brigadier, 350th Tank Company, French Army.During the course of an engagement in which the French tanks assisted the American Infantry to attack a difficult position, the tank in which Brigadier Baurin was advancing was put out of action and his companion wounded by heavy artillery fire. He continued to assist his comrade in firing until the ammunition was completely exhausted and then dismounted from the tank and he carried the wounded man to the American line through the intense enemy fire.  |
